MUNICH.—Richard Löwenherz (Richard Cœur-de-Lion), by Grétry, was produced on the King's birthday. There was a very brilliant audience, but the opera did not meet with a very warm reception.—Dr. Hans von Bülow, who, last May, left this capital in dignified disgust, and retired to Switzerland, has now returned, and is again always with the King.

ESSLINGEN.—The Oratorienverein, under the direction of Professor Chr. Fink, has given a concert of sacred music for the benefit of the wounded soldiers, the following being the programme:—"Gloria Patria," Palestrina; Sacred Song of the 16 century: "Jesu, meines Lebens Leben;" Organ-Prelude, Seb. Bach; Soprano Air from The Messiah, Handel; Three-Part Chorus, Barth. Cordans; Four-Part Chorus, J. A. Hasse; Bass Air from Elijah, Mendelssohn; Chorus with Solo-Quartet from Die letzten Dinge, Spohr; Soprano Air; Agnus Dei, Mozart; Sacred Choral Song, Chr. Fink; Soprano Air from St. Paul, Mendelssohn; and Motet: "Macht hoch die Thür," from Hauptmann.

MAGDEBURG.—The following was the programme to a concert given lately by the Kirchengesangsverein, under the direction of Herr Rebling, for the benefit of the wounded Prussian soldiers:—Chorale: "Wenn dich Unglück hat betreten," Seb. Bach; Hymn for Soprano Solo, Chorus, and Organ: "Hör' mein Bitten," Mendelssohn; Chorale: "Befehl Du Deine Wege," Seb. Bach; Adagio from Beethoven's C minor Symphony, arranged for the Organ by Herr Rebling; Psalm: "Kommt her und schaut die Werke des Herrn," Rolle; Duet for two Basses: "Der Herr ist der Starke Held," Handel; "Salvum fac Regem," for Chorus, Löwe; Fantasia for Organ, Hesse (played by Herr Rebling); The 100th Psalm, Mendelssohn.

COPENHAGEN.—A Conservatory of Music is to be established under the guidance of MM. Niels W. Gade, J. P. E. Hartmann, and Paulli. All the pupils will be required to attend the classes for piano, theory, and choral singing.

Concerts.

The Bateman concerts have had the whole field to themselves during the past three weeks (except the usual noontide Organ performances), the tenth and last of them having been given in the Music Hall last evening. Since they began (on the 26th ult.) the artists, we believe, have had but three evenings of rest, while they have made excursions to Hartford, Providence twice, and Lowell. Abundant success has crowned almost every effort.

The four concerts of the first week—what we may call Mr. Bateman's pre-Brignolite period—were crowded close together into the four last nights of the week. This frequency, together with the inferior and very miscellaneous character of the programmes, thinned the audiences of Thursday, Friday and Saturday. It was indeed unaccountable that M<sup>me</sup>. PAREPA, one of the queens of song in all the nobler kinds, should have had almost no chance in four nights to sing anything important. There was nothing (better than Verdi), as we have seen, the first night. After that, the little duet: "Crudel perché finora," from Mozart's Figaro, the duet from The Barber: "Dunque io son," the duet "La ci darem," and the air "Und ob die Wolke" from Der Freyschütz, were the only things that could interest a musically cultivated audience. And the absence of an orchestra in the last of these was an injustice both to the music and the singer; she sang it sweetly, truly, but not with the inspiration of the Lind, or that simple, winning fervor of M<sup>me</sup>. Frederici, who of course is by no means her equal as a singer. The duets were admirable. For the rest, there was the hacknied "Robert, to me j'aime," and nothing else but the two Ardit waltzes (Il Bacio and L'Estasi), the showy and uninteresting, artificial "Nightingale's Trill," and modern English ballads, of a common stamp, the one exception perhaps being "The Storm" by Hullah, which is impressive, if not particularly original. In all this miscellany, to be sure, M<sup>me</sup>. Parepa showed her great versatility and finished art in song, as well as her command of several languages.

The best things in those programmes were not set down to her. The most appetizing of the vocal selections were those which brought in the Italian buffo element, so admirably represented by Signor FERRANTI. His Don magnifico from "Cinderella," his Fop ("Il farfallone") by Mattei, his "Non più andrai," the fisher's song, "La Pesca," also by Mattei, his Rossini Tarantella: "Già la luna," and his Barcarole from Ricci's "Prison of Edinburgh," were all capital illustrations of the quick creative genius of fine musical fun. He enters wholly into the spirit of the thing; his eyes are full of it as well as his voice and hands and every look and motion. We are rapidly reconciled to his extravagance of action, it is so genuine, and at the same time so instinct with art. In the duets with Parepa he was equally good.

Sig. FORTUNA's solos were a romanza from Donizetti's Maria di Rudenz, and another ("Di Provenza"), twice, from La Traviata. Unimportant selections, but sung in a very chaste and finished style. This singer gains upon us by his uniformly artistic use of his light, sweet baritone voice, so tenor-like in quality, and by his gentlemanly bearing. He did justice to the earnest, pleading little duet from Figaro, and bore his part well with Ferranti in what we forgot to mention as one of the best and, for our day, most novel of the comic specimens, the Duo "Se fiato," from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto. Surely the concerts have been rich in that element.

Mr. MILLS had, musically, the most important tasks in those first concerts. In the second he played the two remaining movements of the Schumann Concerto (Intermezzo and Finale); and in the third, the Romanza and Finale from Chopin's Concerto in E minor; being rather better supported by the orchestra on these occasions. Both were admirably rendered; in truth of reading, in cleanness, firmness, brilliancy and beauty of execution there seemed nothing wanting; it was only a little cold, which perhaps accounts for a coldness complained of in the audience, though we are more inclined to believe that those were not audiences for piano-playing even of the best but made up mainly of half-musical people who went to hear Parepa's ballads. However, Mr. Mills has steadily gained in favor, and proves himself an unassuming, intelligent, earnest artist, believing in the best and seeking it, while in all that relates to technique he can scarcely have a superior. The dashing Fantasia pieces (Liszt's Africaine, his own on Faust) revealed his rare power as an executant. More pleasing were an Etude of Chopin, and in a certain way some little pieces of his own, especially his Tarantelle.

CARL ROSA's contributions were: the first movement of a Military Concerto by Lipinski, bold, broad in harmony, and brilliant; the "Souvenir de Haydn" again; Ernst's Elegie, brought out with rare feeling and perfection; a brilliant Concert Waltz by Alard; a fantastic "Witch's Dance" by Bazzini,—these with orchestra—and on the Saturday, without orchestra, "Auld Robin Gray," which most beautiful of the Scotch melodies his violin sings with searching purity of tone and feeling, and the little peeping extravaganza on the high harmonics which he calls Caprice fantastique, a pretty bit of clap-trap made up, we believe, by Miska Hauser. Other little things he played for encores, for the charm of his art and whole appearance is unailing.

An orchestra—small one of twenty-four instruments—under Mr. ZERRAEN, had lent interest and dignity to the concerts until Saturday. Overtures, to Semiramide, Freyshütz, Don Giovanni, Merry Wives of Windsor, were rather nicely played, and helped to create an appetite before each part. But in the fourth concert this artistic element was dropped, and Mr. HATTON had to do all the work of accompaniment at the piano,—an art in which he is a master. Besides which, he figured again, for once, in another of his old characters, as a singer of "eccentric songs." "The little fat man" was as exquisitely funny as ever, with his liquid as it were impromptu piano accompaniment. The voice has lost some of its freshness, to be sure (it is seventeen years since Hatton was here singing comic songs, singing Elijah and conducting it too, playing Beethoven Sonatas, Mendelssohn G-minor Concerto and Bach fugues!), but the little fat man is hale and hearty as ever, his whole body full of music and of humor, and those little things, which would be flat or coarse in others, have a charm of fitness and imaginative fineness with him—not that we think the concert room the fittest place for them. The Music Hall was one sea of laughter (anerühmon gelasma), and he had to sing it again, and another of the same sort. By the way, one of his clever tricks, in preluding to the song was to begin with a bit of sparkling Bach fugue, then a touch of Papageno and his whistle, whereby folks were cheated into finding Bach amusing!

SECOND WEEK.

Flimsy programmes and running the machine too constantly, as we have said, reduced the audiences; so caterer Batonian, as if discouragingly treated by these unreasonable Athenians, incontinently announced "three last concerts" for the week beginning Monday, Oct. 1. Then began the BRIGNOLI period. The manager had kept the sweet-voiced tenor in reserve as extra battery for re galvanizing the cold corpse of enthusiasm. And, whether owing to Brignoli or not—for surely his return was not an art event of signal importance—the policy succeeded. There was a crowd. The tenor was in the best power and beauty of his voice and sang his old songs, from Martha, from Linda, besides a romanza called "Alice," in his very best style. The music was perhaps hardly worth such voice and art, but the singing was delightful, and the singer was encouraged all along by heartiest applause. It was evidently sweet to him to please a Boston audience after not very flattering recognition in the opera houses abroad.

PALEPA's best that evening was "Bel raggio" from the luxurious, gold and purple Semiramide music of Rossini; it was superbly executed in her best voice. So was the duet from Linda. Ballads as usual; scarcely one can sing or point them more effectively. FERRANTI gave the Cinderella Don Magnifico and a Tarantella, also by Rossini; we need not say how happily. FORTUNA repeated "Il balen." MILLS was kept upon effect pieces (Liszt's "Rakoczy march" and his own cleverly contrived Faust fantasy; ROSA, upon mere Concert Waltz and Trovatore (!) variations. The Overtures were the Freyshütz and Mendelssohn's Heimkehr. Indifferent as the programme was, the artists were all interesting and admirably well up to their work.

The next (Wednesday) might be called Mr. HATTON's night, for the chief labor fell on him; besides "presiding" at the piano, he had to conduct the orchestra, and did he not put a life into the charming little Nozze di Figaro, as well as the Zanetta overture? He looks and acts so full of the music that it becomes contagious, to orchestra and audience. Moreover, a song of his, "Good-bye, sweet heart," was sung by Brignoli, and very handsomely for an Italian in English. A sweet song too, full of natural, simple feeling, and gracefully worked out. Hatton has composed scores of songs far better than the English ballads now so much in vogue. Indeed we do not know an Englishman, unless it be Sterndale Bennett, who has written songs of such high character; though, like Bennett's, they often seem like lunar reflections of the Mendelssohnian sun; but they are poetic, graceful, expressive and artistic. Brignoli also sang "In terra" by Mercadante, and in the charming comic duo from L'Elisir, with Ferranti, that night. The buffo sang a jolly Canzone: "Il Merciajuolo" (the pedlar) by Gariboldi, and, with Parepa, the Duo: "Ah, si, si, marito" from Crispino. Fortuna, a romanza from Don Pasquale. Rosa played the "Fantasia-Caprice" by Vieuxtemps, and "Witch's Dance" again; Mills the Chopin Etude, the Tarantella by Mills, and the Africaine fantasia again, and won a warm encore. Mme. Parepa's solos were "O luce" from Linda, and a barcarolle by Gounod: "Ou voulez vous aller," for the first time. Another crowd, and as delighted as before.

Ditto of the third of the "last" concerts—which very naturally led to the announcement of three more, the last of the last. This time the overtures were delightful ones, the Barbiere and the Zauberflöte. Hatton still conducting; the latter, especially, went nicely and clearly. Mme. Parepa sang Batti, batti, accompanied only by the piano and Rosa playing the violoncello part as violin obbligato. It was artistically sung of course, but we think some other singers have realized the charm of that Mozart melody more perfectly to us. She sang also two ballads: one "The Sailor's Wife," composed by Mr. Boott, a Boston gentleman long resident in Florence, proved very effective with the public; the other was one of the English "Claribel" things. The best feature of the programme (next to the overtures) was the Quatuor from Don Pasquale, sung by Parepa, Brignoli, Ferranti and Fortuna, and beautifully done by each and all. Brignoli still did his best, most loyally, in "La mia letizia from I Lombardi" and the Hatton song again. Ferranti rattled off Rossini's "Largo al factotum" with all the volubility and mercurial humor of a true Italian Figaro; and sang, too, the "Postiglione" by Balfe. Il Balen again, for the third or fourth time, served to show Sig. Fortuna's tasteful style of singing. Mr. Mills repeated some of his old piano pieces and Rosa's only solo was again the Concert Waltz, with "Auld Robin Gray" for encore.

THIRD WEEK. The extra farewell concerts, at least two of the three, were distinguished by better programmes. Other things being equal, the better programme draws the better audience in a community which has heard so much good music as Boston. Managers must be willing to see that people have learned something by experience. In the long run the best things please more than things cheap and popular; single instances to the contrary are of small account, for oftentimes an audience, like any individual, are cold and dull to things which excite and charm them at other times, owing to circumstances wholly apart from the music in itself, such as other absorbing topics, an exciting election, the influence of weather, or the time at which you take them, whether at the flood or ebb tide of enjoyments. Last Sunday's concert, being "sacred," had perforce to show respect to "high art" in the programme. The chief drawback was the absence of an orchestra—now felt to be an essential to a first-class concert. Instead of it, Mr. WILLCOX played the Samson overture on the great organ, in very clear and noble style, and would have wound up the concert with an Offertoire by Batiste, if the wind had not given out in the middle of it (and some we fear, are wicked enough not to care if that accident should happen oftener in such show pieces!) Mme. PAREPA's voice never sounded more superbly than in Handel's air, "From mighty kings." That is the kind of music which we like best of all to hear her sing. The large voice and style, the great endurance, with which she launches forth the ringing phrases, where generous power rather than fine imaginative genius is required, just suit this lofty kind of song. It was indeed a glorious effort. Her other oratorio selection was of a feebler sort, one of the Haydn commonplaces, the duet "Graceful Consort," which she sang finely with Fortuna.

But what most gave a classical character to the concert were the instrumental selections from J. S. Bach. These, though for single instruments, were truly relished; especially the Air, full of tender, heart-felt, lovely melody, and the quaint and lively Gavotte from an orchestral Suite, as played by Rosa and Hatton; this was imperatively encored—a signal triumph for Bach over a miscellaneous audience, but of course a better one than poorer programmes draw!

The Fugue, too, in G minor, for the Violin alone, which Rosa played with great breadth, power and clearness, carrying the polyphonic harmony along unbroken, was listened to with silent interest to the end. This was the Joachim style of playing, and the kind of music in which that master has achieved his greatest triumphs. Verily we have become convinced that the Violin is the best medium, best entering wedge, for inspiring a true appreciation of Bach. Mr. Mills, too, played a Prelude and Fugue of Bach on the piano, one in C minor from the "Well-tempered Clavichord"; this was received more coldly, though it was clearly rendered, doubtless owing to the nature of the instrument in so large a room. There was another piece, founded on Bach, but not Bach, indeed as far the opposite as possible, namely Gounod's Ave Maria, arranged from Bach's 1st Prelude in C, for Soprano, with violin, piano and organ. The little Prelude is complete in itself; Gounod's superstructure wholly in another spirit, modern, sentimental and dramatic. Considered as Gounod's only, as a rich and striking instance of euphonious effect, we have no objection to it, and indeed, with all the audience, find it very impressive. Mme. Parepa sang a rather taking sentimental song by Blumenthal, "The children's kingdom," worked up in like style.

Mr. Mills's smaller pieces were "Evening" by Schumann and an Etude by Chopin, both beautiful. Sig. Brignoli sang Beethoven's "Adelaide," making, with Hatton's accompaniment, an excellent impression. Spirto gentil we cared less about, but it was very finely sung. Ferranti's principal piece was the Pro Peccatis from Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Fortuna sang a Prayer by Mercadante.—Here we must pause.

PIANO TEACHERS.—MR. PETERSILEA has not left Boston for New York; on the contrary he has many pupils here and will doubtless make his mark too in the concerts.—Another Leipzig student, Mr. STEPHEN A. EMERY, formerly of Portland, announces himself as teacher of piano forte and musical theory; his Leipzig associates commend him highly.

The first public rehearsal takes place Oct. 20, the same day on which THEO. THOMAS gives his first Symphony Soirée. The New York Musik-Zeitung intimates that the success of this enterprising young rival has prompted the symptoms of "progress" shown by the older Society in the Liszt-Wagner-Berlioz selections above named. Certainly the programmes of both parties have many novelties in common. But Thomas is the bolder of the two and has undertaken to do in five concerts work that might well tax the energies of an orchestra for a couple of years. He makes the production of great orchestral works with chorus the special mark of his ambition this year. Here is his list for the five soirées:

- Symphony, "Columbus," Op. 31.....Abert.
Two Episodes from Lenau's "Faust": 1. "The Procession by Night"; 2. "The Dance in the Village Inn." 1st time.....Liszt.

Symphony in B flat, op. 120.....Schumann.

Concerto for piano, in G.....Beethoven.

The "Mendelssohn Union" are to supply the chorus.

The same gentleman has commenced the rehearsals for the first concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, to be conducted by him, which will comprise the "Columbus" Symphony by Abert; Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; and the "Reitersmarsch" by Schubert, instrumented by Liszt.

CARL ANSCHUTZ began a series of "sacred" concerts last Sunday evening at the Germania Assembly Rooms. Among the pieces performed were: Haydn's Symphony No. 12, in E flat; Overture "In Frühling," by Vierling; and Wagner's Vorspiel "Die Meistersänger von Nürnberg," which seems to figure upon all the New York programmes.

Mr. MAX STRAKOSCH has commenced his concert season, in the cave of Cooper Institute. He has several new artists. Herr Bökelman, a young pianist of the Bülow school, played Liszt's Schiller March." The Review says:

This school materially differs from that of the concert-players who have been en vogue in this country since Gottschalk used his eminent talent to spoil the taste of the American public, and to introduce silly sentimentality and enervating softness in playing. That narrowness of style, want of a large and broad conception, effeminate touch and affected coquetry in playing, which is called "sweet playing" in this country, is entirely discarded by the modern school of pianists, while they consider it the highest aim of the pianist to combine the most perfect execution with an orchestral grandeur of expression and a conception which renders the ideas of the composer in their utmost breadth and depth. Mr. Bökelman possesses the full material for this task, but he lacks that calmness and self-possession which is necessary for a pianist who appears in public.

Besides him, there were a new prima donna, Mlle. Plodowska, described as "brilliant and effective," "managing a voice somewhat worn with masterly skill;" Signor Lamberti, a charming tenor voice, singing with taste; Mlle. de Gebelo, Carl Formes, and Jehin Prume, the violinist.

MOLLENHAUER's first Conservatory concert, for the benefit of the pupils, consisted of Beethoven's string Quartet in A, op. 18, No. 5, played by Messrs. Ed. and Henry Mollenhauer, Master Bernard Bretto and H. Gramm; Bach's Chaconne for violin (E. Mollenhauer); Schubert's Ave Maria on the violoncello (H. Mollenhauer); Sonata, piano and violin, op. 24, Beethoven (by pupils); Schubert's Trio in B flat, by J. N. Pattison, pianist, and the two Mollenhauers.

Mr. GROVER has organized a travelling concert troupe, with some of the artists of his collapsed German Opera; viz.: Mme. Frederici, and Messrs. Hahelmann, Himmer and Hermann, to whom is added Wehli, the pianist.

CAMILLA UNSO, the lady violinist, has returned for a few months, after most flattering success in Europe. M. Padeloup has engaged her for his popular classical concerts during the Exhibition of 1867. There is a probability of her re-visiting Boston before that time.

Operatic enterprises of the smaller sort are enjoying a brief after-summer season until the more absorbing Italian combination finds a rebuilt Academy ready for "inauguration." There has been Italian Opera at the French Theatre, under Mr. DRAPER's management: Martha, with Mlles. Boschetti and Gebelo, Sig. Tamaro, Locatelli and Carl Formes; Trovatore, with Massimiliani, Mme. De Rossi, Boschetti, Orlandini, and others; Rigoletto, with Miss Emily Boughton (American) as Gilda,—and so on. There will be, at the same theatre, French opera by M. Juignet's troupe, beginning with Halévy's "Mousquetaires de la Reine." At the New York Theatre, a new season of English opera, under Mr. EICHBERG's direction, whose "Doctor of Alcantara" led off last week. He has added several new and pretty pieces to it. The parts were taken by Mrs. Gomersal, Miss Maria Norton, Mrs. Mozart, Mr. John Farley, Mark Smith, Weinlich, Gomersal, &c.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS. We have the following communication, dated Sept. 24:

"Thursday evening last, one of the finest classical soirées ever given in this place took place at the Music Hall Wareroom of Messrs. Clarke, Kidder & Co., the headquarters for musical people in this musical town, well known as the home of Jenny Lind while in this country. The performers on this occasion were: Pianists—Mrs. Kloss, of New York; Mrs. Thompson (formerly Mrs. Baker), of New York; Miss K. E. Prince, of Northampton. Vocalists—Mrs. Wentworth and Mr. Ticknor, of Boston; Dr. and Mrs. Meekins, Miss J. W. Shepard, and Mr. W. A. Clarke, of Northampton. The programme, which is annexed, was rendered in the most artistic and satisfactory manner by some of the best amateur artists in this country, and listened to by an appreciative audience of about one hundred persons.

- Quartet, 4 hands.....Haydn.
Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Kloss.
"Dove song".....Mozart.
Mrs. Wentworth.
a Longing by the sea.....Chopin.
b Scherzo.....Mozart.
Duet, "Le Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart.
Mrs. Wentworth and Mr. Ticknor.
Quartet, 8 notes.....Wekerlin.
Theme and Variations, Two Pianos.
Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Kloss.

Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Kloss.

The construction of Music and Piano Warerooms, to be used for concert purposes, by Messrs. Clarke, Kidder & Co., is worthy of imitation; and by giving classical concerts from time to time, free to their musical friends and patrons, pianoforte manufacturers can do much towards advancing the musical taste of our large towns."

The Ballad of the Weaver.

BY A. ADERNETHY COWLES.

All day she sits at her cottage door,
When the breath of the summer is sweet and warm,
When the sunlight flickers across the floor,
And the wild bees swim in a drowsy swarm.
All day long at her cottage door,
Fair in feature and dear of form,
Morning and evening,—over and o'er,
Weaves she in sunshine—weaves she in storm.

All day long—though the fields are green,
And shadowy woodlands tempt the sight—
With patient fingers and eyes serene,
She weaves, as she waits for her absent knight,
As fair a fabric as ever was seen,
With roses and lilies richly pied,
And the crimson petals are stained, I ween,
With drops of blood from her fingers white.

Whether he comes in the flush of June,
When the wild brier blooms at the cottage gate,
Whether he comes with the Autumn moon,
Whether he comes when the cuckoos mate;
Come he at dawning, come he at noon,
Come he early or come he late,
Little it matters, for one sweet tune
Singeth she ever—I wait! I wait!

Of all that ride in that knightly train,
One is noble and true, I know.
Surely he will come back again
And bear her away at his saddle bow.
All the longing and all the pain
She will breathe in whisperings soft and low,
And he'll kiss from her fingers the crimson stain
As they pass through the evening's tender glow.

The dry vine swings at the cottage gate;
The years have come and the years have flown;
With lips that hunger and eyes that wait,
The weaver sits at her task alone.
Morning and evening, early and late,
She weaves, and she makes no sigh or moan,
But the woof of the fabric is dark as fate,
And the grace of the vision gone.

The state of affairs at the Imperial Operahouse, commonly called the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, was then, and is partially even at the present day, a peculiar one, as far as its management is concerned. This state of affairs we must shortly explain.

While, at nearly all the Court Theatres in the world, the management is conducted under the supreme direction of an Intendant appointed by the Government, it was carried on at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, by two lessees, one of whom, Carlo Ballochino, attended to the German, and the other, Bartolomeo Morelli, to the Italian Opera, of which, during the months of April, May, and June, there were at least eighty performances. The lessees engaged and discharged the various ordinary officials connected with the administration, and possessed the power of proposing, nay more, partly of vetoing the engagement even of the officials and artists distinguished as "Imperial." In addition to these rights, and the advantages therefrom accruing, they received a yearly grant of 75,000 florins. They were, however, bound to make good out of their own pocket any deficit; but then, on the other hand, all the profit there might be was theirs. Whether such a system of management, when it does not happen to be in the hands of perfectly disinterested patrons of art, is worthy of approval, and tends to the honor of the theatre, and whether it is, generally, advisable to entrust an Italian with full power to act as he pleases with German opera is a point to which we shall return in the course of our notice. For the present, we can only state that Opera was then in a really brilliant condition, and that the Operahouse, as it then was, was the only one in Germany where Nicolai could find a satisfactory sphere for his grand ideas. He had under his direction an admirable and experienced orchestra, comprehending, besides the 7 soloists, all first-rate artists, 20 violinists, 6 tenorists, 6 violoncellists, 6 double-bassists, 4 flautists, 4 oboists, 4 clarinetists, 4 French-horn players, 4 bassoonists, 4 trombonists, 4 trumpeters, and 2 kettle-drummers, over whom were, firstly: 3 orchestral-directors (Hellmesberger, Grutsch, and Groidl), and secondly: the Capellmeisters, Heinrich Proch and Reuling, Nicolai being at the head of all, as first Capellmeister.

As regards vocalists, again, he found in the German company distinguished names such as Mmes. Hasselt-Barth, Treffz, Notte, Lutzer, (to whom were subsequently added Mmes. Stöckl-Heinefetter, Ney, and Zerr), as well as Herren Erl, Kraus, Pfister, (and afterwards Ander), Draxler, and Staudigl; in the Italian company, Mmes. Tadolini (afterwards replaced by Tachinardi-Persiani, Tedesco, and Alboni), Marini, Brambilla, Salvina, Signori Donzelli, Moriani, Badiali, Donatelli (subsequently Calzolari and Labozetta), and Rovere, the incomparable basso-buffo.

Out of this rare assemblage, Nicolai, by his enthusiastic and inspiring zeal, and restless energy, produced a splendid whole, such as was never known since in any German theatre. His punctuality, conscientiousness, and patience, the intelligence with which, at rehearsals, he seized the meaning of the works he had to direct, and required an interpretation in keeping with that meaning, inspired every one with respect, and, most of all, those who had thought to find in him a frivolous, fickle maestro of the true Italian stamp. In consequence of this, the Imperial Operahouse, even in the first winter, again attained a position such as it had not held for years. The first opera which the new Capellmeister conducted was Mozart's Don Juan, followed, after two rehearsals, by Beethoven's Fidelio. Between the two acts of the latter, Nicolai had the grand overture to Leonore performed, an innovation which found a ready response and imitators at other theatres. At the earlier performances, it had always to be played twice, amid the most lively applause. After these works came revivals of Donizetti's Martiri, under the name of Die Römer in Melitane, which, however, did not please in its German dress, and La Favorita. Nicolai's talent in getting up and conducting works met with the most gratifying reception and appreciation.

But this did not satisfy the young Capellmeister. Just as he himself concentrated his own powers from every side upon all the points of the artistic perspective, having, for instance, immediately after his arrival in Vienna, set about studying most assiduously the German musical classics, he desired to procure the most varied means of display for the resources under his direction, and for this purpose the splendid orchestra, applied hitherto simply to opera, was eminently fitted. This was the first idea of the establishment of the Philharmonic Society, which his restless zeal soon afterwards brilliantly succeeded in calling into existence. Taking for his models the Möser and Spontini "Sinfonie-Soirées," which he had attended in Berlin, he constituted the Philharmonic Concerts, the great feature of which was to be the most perfect possible execution of classical Symphonies and Overtures, with episodic performances by celebrated virtuosos and singers, for the sake of introducing an agreeable change. In order not to fatigue and deter the public, the programmes of each evening were to include as few pieces as possible, but their execution was to satisfy the highest expectations, and make up for the shortness of the entertainment. What a wide field of action was opened up by this bold idea for Nicolai! His indefatigable spirit alone could have overcome the manifold obstacles in the way; have collected a thoroughly good orchestra; interest the public for the works, which, with unexampled energy, he undertook carefully to select and get up; and, by his own warmth and enthusiasm in managing it, attach the public to the institution. By his establishment and management of the Philharmonic Concerts, the first of which took place on Easter Monday, 1842, Nicolai has made for himself a name never to be forgotten in the musical annals of Vienna, a fact that the public acknowledged by their attendance, which, after his departure, was never anything like as numerous. But Nicolai's rare talent as a conductor was so strongly displayed after he undertook the management of the orchestra at Vienna, that he stood quite alone in this particular, in which, perhaps, he had no real rival, except Mendelssohn. As a conductor he resembled a bronze column, supporting and keeping up the artistic body into which he had blended his various masses. A physician clears a path for his exertions by the confidence he inspires, and Nicolai's appearance as conductor was certain of a similar result. He wielded his conducting-stick with earnestness, prudence, and the greatest energy, so that not a single bar escaped his observation. He obtained delicate and nicely graduated effects from phrases apparently the most insignificant, and, as a rule, governed the waves of sound not as a mere helmsman, but tamed and swayed them like some governing spirit. Nicolai's mode of conducting was not only clever but interesting for an observer, since, in every instance, it produced a lively feeling of conscious certainty and infallible success.

The operas he conducted, as well as the Philharmonic Concerts, were thus a long series of the most honorable manifestations of his extraordinary talent, and rendered him, which was always a source of the greatest pride to him, a more popular favorite than almost any artist had been before.

The programme of the Philharmonic Concerts for 1842-3 included, also, the select works of the classical composers, and the admirable performances of that unrivalled violinist, Vieuxtemps, of the pianist Kullak (at present Pianist to the Court, and Professor in Berlin), and numerous singers. Concerning the first of these concerts in November, 1842, the correspondent of the Paris Revue et Gazette Musicale (series for 1843, No. 9), writes:—

"M. Nicolai, Capellmeister to the Court, gave a Philharmonic Concert in the large room of the Redoute. The orchestra was that of the Imperial Opera, and, as usual, distinguished itself for its ensemble, and brilliant execution, which must satisfy the severest critics most inclined to find fault. The programme included only four numbers, but all of classic worth, namely: Mozart's Symphony in G minor; two airs sung by Mmes. Hasselt and Lutzer, Kullak accompanying on the piano; and, to conclude, Beethoven's Grand Symphony in C minor. Every thing was performed with marvellous precision, but Mozart's wonderful Symphony left far behind all that had been previously heard, as we venture unconditionally to assert. Never were the nicest gradations, all the lights and shadows of this magnificent tone-painting rendered with equal care and clever exactness. We owe M. Nicolai our profoundest thanks for his clever and sage conducting, which clearly proves with what seriousness and conscientiousness he has studied the works of our great masters. Let us hope, for the honor of the orchestra and our classic composers, that M. Nicolai will go on with these magnificent concerts."

Nicolai did go on, appreciated by the critics, the public, and his orchestra. The latter, in return for his invaluable services, commissioned Kriehuber to paint his portrait, which soon appeared in all the shop-windows of Vienna.

Elsewhere, too, people began to recognize his worth, and he experienced great pleasure at being named, in December, 1842, together with Spohr, and the son of Mozart, whom he enthusiastically honored, an honorary member of the Mozarteum in Salzburg.

But Nicolai wished to distinguish himself in Vienna as a creative artist, also, in order to prove that Italy had exerted a favorable rather than a contrary influence upon his style of composition, and he wrote, therefore, some Pianoforte Pieces, including a grand Sonata, Op. 27, in D minor, and several songs, with which latter he was very successful, since they were treated in Franz Schubert's manner, the only one the public would then have. From among them, "Wilhelmine" and "Die Thräne," published by Mechetti, soon became very popular. But not all his pleasing and highly feeling songs of that period were published; most of them must still be among his unpublished papers.

To afford musical Vienna evidence of his activity and talent as a composer as well as conductor, he got up, in April, 1843, a concert, in which he gave only his own compositions, but of the most different styles, namely: a very sonorous eight-part Paternoster, for solos and chorus a capella, treated in the sacred Italian style of the 17th century, and published, as Op. 33, by Schott, Mayence; and further, a fugued Overture and Chorus, on a chorale, treated in the German style of the 18th century. Then came four numbers of his opera, Proserpina, as well as the favorite song "Wilhelmine," which brought to a close the applause that followed each piece.*

Thus, from the very first, we behold Nicolai in a sphere of indefatigable and restless activity, rendered happy by the marks of appreciation everywhere tendered, and exciting him to fresh efforts. But he was destined, also, to experience disappointments, which, in consequence of his excitable state, that always had a decided tendency to an ailing character, affected him more deeply and more severely than they would have affected other men. Thus, with the German confidence and frankness inherent to his nature, he attached himself to Donizetti, whom he highly prized, and who, having been appointed Imperial Chamber-Composer and Capellmeister, came, in February, 1843, from Paris to Vienna. But this friendship was not destined to last long. For reasons connected with the posture of affairs at the Kärnthnorth Theatre, and the short duration of the theatrical evening, it was one of the duties of the conducting Capellmeister to bring, by cuts and omissions, the operas to be represented within the proper bounds. Nicolai, who performed this task with especial unwillingness, had always gone to work in such cases with the greatest possible conscientiousness and the care peculiar to him. He could not, however, satisfy Donizetti, when, at the beginning of the Italian operatic season of 1843, the latter composer's Elisir d'Amore was produced. On the contrary, Donizetti's anger increased more and more, during the evening, as he missed this or that, to his mind, admirable piece, until, at the conclusion of the performance, he rushed up to the unsuspecting Nicolai, whom he called a "bambino," and would have proceeded to personal violence, had not the bystanders taken the part of the person thus assailed. Nicolai's friends recommended a duel with the Italian. But Nicolai, smiling, declined such a course, with the words: "Were this man to shoot me, nothing would be gained by it; on the contrary, I should deprive the musical world of the fruits of my studies, and it has still a good many to demand of me."

All further intercourse with Donizetti was naturally brought to an end by this scene, and Nicolai obstinately rejected every attempt at reconciliation on the part of the aggressor; what had happened did not, however, exert any influence on his opinion of Donizetti as a composer.

The experience gained by Nicolai in his laborious task of remodelling Il Proscritto induced him to abandon entirely the further re-arrangement of his Italian operas, and set a German book at once, in the writing of which he might himself take a part, and at length obtain a satisfactory libretto. The performances of his Heimkehr des Verbannten, and the task of directing the Philharmonic Concerts, which he zealously and successfully carried on during the winter of 1843-44 also, did not allow him to make much progress in the study of the best Italian and Spanish dramatists, from whom he wanted to take a subject. With restless industry, he sketched whole series of scenes and acts, selected from various sources, merely to reject them over and over again. His professional duties, despite the time required by these labors, did not suffer, however, in the slightest degree. As far as they were concerned, he was the same punctual and careful man he was all his life. Speaking of his musical activity, the musical correspondent of Hauptmann's Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung was justified in exclaiming: "Whoever still takes as his favorite theme the insipid notion of indulging in turgid lamentations on the complete decay of taste here '(in Vienna),' should make himself acquainted with the enthusiasm of the Viennese for such compositions and performances as are offered them at the Philharmonic Concerts." Further on, we read: "The Capellmeister, Herr Otto Nicolai, understands so well how to spur on the ambition of the splendid orchestra of our Imperial Operahouse, and to fill it with inspiration for the lofty aims of art, that, excited by his clever and energetic management, it really effects wonders. Simply to listen to a piano, a crescendo, a diminuendo here, nay, only to the rare agreement of the violins in the upward and downward strokes, in the employment of the same fingering, etc., is, apart from the dynamic effect, of itself, considered technically, a treat. May this magnificent art-institute, revived by the art-loving and talented Nicolai, be successful! May it henceforth be able to maintain its position upon the elevated ground of its own worth, and the appreciation of the public!"

Before the conclusion of the year 1843, Nicolai was delighted by an honorable mark of distinction. In return for the dedication of the Mass composed in Italy, and written up in Vienna, he received from King Friedrich Wilhelm IV., of Prussia, the Gold Medal for Art and Science, together with a flattering letter of thanks. The favor of the art-loving monarch was, also, extended to him long afterwards.

Another pleasing surprise for the worthy composer was reserved till the commencement of the following year, when he received an invitation from the Magistracy of his native town, Königsberg, to attend, as an eminent fellow-townsmen, the great jubilee held by the University in conjunction with the Town, to celebrate the 300th year of the existence of the former, from the 27th to the 31st of August inclusive. Nicolai was most profoundly moved by this unexpected proof of appreciation, awarded only to the most distinguished men. It awoke in his noble mind feelings that affected him like home-sickness. In fact, the whole of his subsequent delightful journey was destined to evoke sentiments and impressions such as a man, in most cases, experiences only in the sweet period of youth, the joys and raptures of which Nicolai had never known. He resolved to express in a musical composition appropriate to the festival his thanks for the flattering mark of attention and recognition on the part of his native town. In memory of the period of the Reformation, from which the establishment of the University, in 1544, dated, he selected Luther's chorale, so strong in faith: "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," as the principal motive for a sacred overture, in the broadest and most grandly solemn style, with orchestra, organ accompaniment, and choruses. The work begins with the chorale admirably arranged in different parts, and sung by the chorus. The instruments then take it up and carry it on very cleverly, until, out of the fragments of the motives introduced, a magnificent double fugue is developed. This affords evidence of wonderful skill and rare power of form, the chorale re-appearing in its broadly treated conclusion. We may as well at once state that this Sacred Overture in its original form, as well as arranged for four hands, and likewise for organ or pedal grand by Liszt, is published as Op. 32, by Hofmeister, Leipzig.

In the middle of July, 1844, Nicolai proceeded by the way of Prague and Breslau, to Berlin. The King, Friedrich Wilhelm, no sooner heard that the Imperial Capellmeister had arrived, before he ordered a concert of a sacred character to be given at Court, and invited Nicolai to take the direction of it. Nicolai obeyed the flattering invitation, and included in the programme several of his own compositions, which were executed by the Cathedral Choir at the Court Soirée in question, and met with approbation in the highest quarter. The King overwhelmed Nicolai with compliments, and entered into a long conversation with him concerning old Italian sacred music and the Sixtine Chapel, on the principle of which latter he wanted his newly-established Cathedral Choir to be managed. Captivated by Nicolai's comprehensive range of information, the King ended by offering him the position of a director of the Choir. Nicolai, however, exerted himself to show how, with all his interest for such a sphere of action, his great department was that of dramatic music, which he should be loth to quit, after his successes in it had demonstrated that it was the one peculiarly adapted for his powers. The King had thus to give up for a time the realization of his wish, but only to seize the first fitting opportunity for summoning the talented musician back again to his native land.

Nicolai now visited his first benefactor, Herr Adler, at Stargard. Herr Adler gave him the most hearty welcome, and it was in his house that Nicolai was surprised by the joyful news that the high-minded King had conferred upon him the Order of the Red Eagle. From Stargard he went to Dantzig, where he visited his sister; and thence to Marienwerder, where his father resided, arriving by the steamer at Königsberg, on the 20th August. Others had previously done what they could to distinguish and to please him, but the Königsbergers surpassed them in marks of respect, sending Nicolai deputations, giving him serenades, etc., by which he was deeply touched. Strange feelings, indeed, probably besieged his heart, when he once more found himself within the walls which had beheld his birth, and the sorrowful period of his youth, and within which he had spent the entire first half of his existence, until—looking at the matter from the cold point of view of practical life—he had left them as a vagabondizing fugitive, to revisit them as a highly respected artist. Such moments, however, outweigh the severest sufferings and are among the sweetest experiences in the life of man.

* That excellent paper, the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, in its twenty-eighth number for 1843, mentions this concert in the following flattering words: "The Capellmeister, Herr Nicolai, who has been rendered doubly dear to us by his energetic direction of the Opera, as well as by his brilliant revival of the Philharmonic Concerts, gave us, at an admirable vocal and instrumental concert, admirably carried out, too, with the co-operation of the artists of the Imperial Operahouse, proofs of such undeniable creative talent, seconded by a study, as comprehensive as thorough, of musical composition, that we eagerly look forward to a work from his pen for the German stage. The rich programme of this concert satisfied both professional and laymen in an equal degree. While, on the one hand, his Templario is still a stock-opera upon the Italian stage, Nicolai here on the other hand showed himself exceedingly skilful in his treatment of strict forms, thus refuting most honorably those who reproach him, a German, with writing in the modern Italian style. He has employed this in the proper place, and will undoubtedly be able to treat the German stage in the spirit peculiar to it. What must prove of great advantage to him when writing for it is his readiness in the cantabile style, which he owes to the good use he made of his long sojourn in Italy, an artistic accomplishment which we wish, with all our heart, were possessed by certain otherwise very estimable German composers."

His stay at Königsberg was a series of honors. The Town presented him with a silver conducting-stick; the University, with a gold snuff-box and two medals struck in honor of the Jubilee. On Nicolai's return to Vienna, the lessee of the theatre deducted sixty florins from his salary, because he was behind his time.

The Music of Provence.

A little book, written in a quaint tongue, has recently been published, and lets in light upon an interesting but almost unknown subject. It is a work on the origin, history, and playing of the Tambourine; its author is Monsieur F. Vidal; and it is written in the Provencal dialect. Our readers need not be alarmed at the announcement, fearing that we be going to quote largely in the idiom so loved by Castil-Blaze and De Roumanillo; for there is much in what M. Vidal says which will bear translating, without availing one's self of M. Vidal's curious language. To English readers at the outset the title, "Le Tambourin," is apt to prove mis-leading. M. Vidal's tambourine has nothing in common with the instrument we are accustomed to associate with a ballet or with a semicircular row of Ethiopian acrobats. It is the tambourine of Provence, one of two instruments, and yet only part of one instrument. For the tambourin and the galoubet are two separate and distinct articles played by one and the same person. The nearest approach to the Provencal musician is the man who officiates as orchestra to Mr. Punch: his drum may represent the tambourin, and his Pandean pipes the galoubet.

For a closer description of each let us have recourse to Castil-Blaze himself, who knew both instruments and can explain. In his Dictionnaire de Musique, he says, "the tambourin is a drum, the case of which is much longer and rather straighter than that of the ordinary drum. It is made of walnut wood in one piece light enough to be hung to the left arm, the head of which serves to play the galoubet, or three-holed pipe, while the right hand strikes the tambourin with a little stick of ebony or ivory. The galoubet is a wind instrument which has fallen into disuse for over two centuries, except in Provence." It is "more gay," says Castil-Blaze, than all other rival instruments, and more acute than all other wind instruments. The player can only attain perfection on the galoubet by dint of hard work and carefulness, for it is fingered with the left hand alone, and the musician has to make two octaves and a note out of three holes. The make of the mouthpiece is intended to eke out the limited means. The key of the galoubet is D; the gamut is made by three different winds: the low D commences with a gentle breath, which can be increased to B; the B is a moderate breath which is increased to F, and the F is a sharp and pinched breath, which is increased till the last note is reached. It is presumably the difficulty of managing the limited instrument which has caused it to be cast aside by the provinces north of Provence.

The galoubet is not played without the tambourin: taken together they are the favorite instruments of the Provencaux. Although the former executes the air and the latter serves as an accompaniment, the player of both is styled a tambourin. Some players do not go about without a clarionetist or two, who reinforce the tunes, often with a wily-conceived impersonation totally differing from the melody which they are supposed to help. The best players of the galoubet attain wonderful mastery over the slight pipe, on which they are frequently able to perform a violin concerto. At the fêtes of Provence they gather in numbers—twenty or twenty-five all playing at once; and though their music is always lively and rapid, they manage to preserve perfect ensemble. This is doubtless attained by the rhythmical strokes on the tambourin, which keeps them up to time. Rustic balls, fandoules, gymnastic games, bull fights, civil ceremonies, even processions—take place in Provence to the sound of the tambourin.

M. Vidal, in common with certain other authorities, derives the word from the tympanon of the Greeks, who are said to have imported the instrument into Provence 600 years before Christ. A derivation so remote is necessarily involved in obscurity; but M. Vidal and his friends have so much ground for their opinion, that in some localities the instrument is known as the tympantin, a near enough approach to the Hellenic word. In Italy it is called tamburino, in Spain taborin, in Catalonia tambori, in Portugal tamboril.

Before the Revolution the tambourin gave the name to a dance which had great favor in the French Court, and was danced on the stage. "A dance," says Jean Jacques Rousseau, "very much the mode to-day at the French theatres. Its air is very gay, and is beaten quick in two time. It should be tripping (sautillant) and well cadenced, in imitation of the pipe of Provence, and the bass should re-strike the same note, in imitation of the tambourin or galoubet, with which he who plays the pipe ordinarily accompanies." Rousseau, it will be seen, confounded the two instruments and made them one; but the error is immaterial. Everybody knows that the tambourin was a celebrated dance of former times, and was reproduced in the French operas: teste Rameau. People then talked of a tambourin as they now talk of a polka or waltz.—Orchestra.

Organs and Organists of Westminster Abbey.

An interesting paper, by Dr. Rimbault, with the above title, appears in Notes and Queries of last week. The first organ erected in Westminster Abbey of which anything is known appears to have been built by Chapington in 1596. The Puritans have the credit of destroying this in 1643, and a new one was erected on the Restoration by Father Smith, at a cost of £120, on the north side of the choir, so that three of the organists—Blow, Purcell, and Croft—were literally buried under the organ. Smith's instrument gave way, in 1730, to one placed over the choir screen, built by Schreider and Jordan, which was subsequently altered and added to by Avery, Elliott, and Hill; and in 1846-8 was entirely remodelled and reconstructed by Mr. Hill, being divided into four portions, the Choir organ occupying its old position on the screen, the Swell being placed under one of the arches on the south side, the Great under the corresponding arch on the north side, and the pedal pipes lying on the top of the screen. By a lapis calami in the first part of the paper, the old organ is made to interrupt the view of the east window from the choir. Of course it is the west window which is meant. The new arrangement allows an uninterrupted view from one end of the church to the other. Considering the extent of the alteration, we think Dr. Rimbault hardly warranted in attributing the "present noble instrument" to Schreider and Jordan. In our opinion, the organ as it existed in 1845, though wanting in mechanical appliances and with only an octave and a note of pedal pipes, was far more suited to its purpose than the present divided instrument, and we believe that any one who remembers the effect of the Full Swell closed in the chant, of the accompaniments to Greene's "Lord let me know mine end," to Travers's "Ascribe unto the Lord," or the effect of Handel's Pastoral Symphony, or the Dead March in Saul, will agree with us. The same gentleman be it remembered, still presides at the instrument, now sitting, as Dr. Rimbault informs us, "surrounded on all sides" by his instrument. The Doctor then proceeds to give, as he says, "a list of the organists from the earliest times to the present, from a MS. in the handwriting of Dr. Benjamin Cooke," who died in 1793. The list, for the latter part of which we presume Dr. Cooke is not answerable, is valuable, and we quote it with but slight abridgment.—Orchestra.

A.D. 1549. John Howe.—Probably a monk, and the person called "father Howe," whose name occurs in the old parish accounts of Lambeth, St. Mary-at-Hill, St. Helen's, &c., as "mondyng" and otherwise attending to the "orgayns."

1570. Robert White, B. A., Mus. Bac., also Master of the Choristers.—This eminent man preceded Tallis and Byrd as a church composer, and died before their fame was fully established. He appears to have been organist of Ely Cathedral from 1562 to 1567.

1575. Henry Levee, also Master of the Choristers.—An unknown name in the history of music.

1588. Edmund Hooper, also Master of the Choristers. He was sworn a Gentleman of the Chapel-royal in 1603, and was the first regularly appointed organist of the Abbey. A copy of his patent is still preserved. Dr. Goodenough says he appears to have been frequently employed in "mending the organ," also in "pricking new song-books." He died in 1621, and was buried in the Cloisters.

1621. John Parsons, also Master of the Choristers.—He was the son of old Robert Parsons, who was drowned at Newark-upon-Trent in 1569. He was appointed organist of St. Margaret's Westminster, in 1616, which situation he probably resigned when he accepted office at the Abbey. He died in August, 1623, and was buried in the Cloisters.

1623. Orlando Gibbons, Mus. Doc.—"One of the rarest musicians of his time," and not inaptly styled the "English Palestrina." He was born at Cambridge (1583?), and in all probability was the son of William Gibbons, who on November 3, 1567, was mitted one of the "waytes" of the town of Cambrid with the annual fee of 40s. He was appointed organist of the Chapel-Royal in 1604; Bachelor Music, 1606; and Doctor in his faculty, 1622. He died in 1625 and was buried in Canterbury Cathedral where there is a monument to his memory.

1625. Thomas Day, also Master of the Choristers. He was sworn a Gentleman of the Chapel-royal in 1615, and died in 1654.

1633. Richard Portman, also Master of the Choristers.—Educated under Orlando Gibbons. He resided some time in France with Dr. Williams, Dean of Westminster, and upon his return was appointed organist of the Chapel-royal.

1660. Christopher Gibbons, Mus. Doc., also Master of the Choristers.—Son of the celebrated Orlando Gibbons. He was organist of Winchester Cathedral before the Civil War, a fact not hitherto known. He died in 1676, and was buried in the cloisters of the Abbey.

1666. Albertus Bryne.—A scholar of John Tomkins, greatly patronized by Charles I., who appointed him, at seventeen years of age, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1660 he petitioned for the place of organist at Whitehall, but whether he succeeded in his application we are not informed. According to Wood, he was buried in the cloisters of the Abbey, but the date of his decease is not given.

1669. John Blow, Mus. Doc.—Born at North Collington, Notts, 1648; Gentleman of the Chapel-royal, 1673; Master of the Choristers of the same, 1674; Almoner and Master of the Choristers of St. Paul's, 1687; and Composer to the Chapel-royal, 1699. The degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him by Archbishop Sancroft. He died Oct. 1, 1708, and was buried on the north side of the choir of Westminster Abbey.

1680. Henry Purcell, the pride and boast of the English school of music, was born in 1658, in the city of Westminster, it is generally supposed. His father Henry and his uncle Thomas were both musicians, and gentlemen of the Chapel-royal at the Restoration. He was educated under Captain Cooke, the master of the royal choristers. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a flat stone covers his grave, with a Latin inscription totally effaced by the footsteps of passengers.

1695. John Blow, Mus. Doc.—This appointment is the one generally known; the fact of his also having preceded his great pupil as organist has been overlooked.

1708. William Croft, Mus. Doc., also Master of the Choristers.—He was born at Nether Easington, Warwickshire, in 1677, and received his education at the Chapel-royal, under Blow. He originally wrote his name Crofts. He became gentleman organist, and composer, in the establishment in which he was educated. His biographers say that his death was caused "by a disease brought on by his attendance at the coronation of George II." This, however, could not have been the case: George II. was crowned on October 11, 1727, and Croft died on August 14 preceding. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, on the north side of the choir.

1727. John Robinson.—One of the choristers of the Chapel-royal under Blow, and, according to Dr. Boyce, "an excellent performer on the organ." He was for many years Dr. Croft's assistant at the Abbey. He died in 1762, aged eighty, and was buried in the same grave with Croft. There is an engraved portrait of him by Vertue, from a painting by T. Johnson.

1762. Benjamin Cooke, Mus. Doc., also Master of the Choristers. He was born in 1734, and died in 1793. He was for many years Mr. Robinson's deputy at the Abbey. There is a monument to his memory in the west cloister of the Abbey, where he was buried, and an engraved portrait of him by Skelton.

1794. Samuel Arnold, Mus. Doc.—He was born in 1739, and educated as a chorister in the Chapel-royal, under Bernard Gates and Dr. Nares. On the death of the latter he succeeded him as organist and composer of the Chapel-royal. He died Oct. 23, 1802, and was buried in the Abbey.

1803. Robert Cooke.—The son of Dr. Benjamin Cooke, and a musician of considerable ability. He was unfortunately drowned in the Thames in 1814.

1815. George Ebenezer Williams.—Educated as a chorister in St. Paul's Cathedral. He was for some years Dr. Arnold's deputy at the Abbey. He died in 1819, at an early age, and was buried in the south ambulatory of the Cloisters.

1819. Thomas Greatorex, F.R.S.—Born Oct. 5, 1758, and educated under Dr. Cooke. He was elected organist of Carlisle Cathedral in 1780, but resigned his post in 1786 in order to study vocal music in Italy. He died July 17, 1831, and was buried in the west cloister of the Abbey, near his friend and master, Dr. Cooke.

1831. James Thrie, also Master of the Choristers. —The deputy of Mr. Greatorex, and the present excellent organist.

Many of the above distinguished church musicians, as will be seen, were also masters of the choristers of Westminster; and amongst the eminent men who were masters, without being organists, occur the names of Walter Porter, 1639; Henry Purcell, Sen. 1661; Thomas Blagrave, 1666; Edward Braddock, 1670; John Church, 1704; Bernard Gates, 1740, &c. We also find among the "copyists" the names of Henry Purcell Sen. 1676; William Tucker, 1678; Edward Braddock, 1690; John Church, 1710; John Buswell, 1761; Thomas Vandernan, 1763; Thomas Barrow, 1782, &c.

Ristori in New York.

(From The Nation, Sept. 27).

Her first appearance was made under very great disadvantages. She was in a foreign city, and among strangers whose temperament was different from her own, who did not understand her language, who had been used to another kind of representation, and who were too full of wondering expectation to comprehend what was before them, or to do it justice. The theatre was small, the stage narrow, the stage arrangements poor, the scenery scanty and cheap. Her company, too, was ordinary, so far as we could judge, perhaps because the terms of her engagement did not allow her to secure a better—perhaps because they, like herself, could not do themselves justice the first time. An enthusiastic audience would have made amends for these drawbacks in part; but the audience was not enthusiastic—the foreign portion remembering what she was abroad, the native portion waiting for her to astonish them into praise.

From these causes the actress labored under a restraint which she did not seem able to throw off. She could not forget herself, and was driven back too absolutely upon her art, instead of throwing soul into her art. The play selected—Legouvé's "Medea"—made all this more conspicuous than it would have been in another piece. In one respect it was admirably calculated for an opening representation, for it calls out precisely the qualities that she is reputed to possess in extraordinary measure. It demands vehement expression of passion, in every extreme, of hate and love, wrath and tenderness, scorn and pity, yearning and vengeance; touching all the chords of emotion from lowest to highest. But, on the other hand, it is a play that suffers from the slightest suspicion of constraint. It requires abandonment; and that was just what Ristori lacked. The want of it was not felt equally throughout; but in parts it was painfully felt, and they were the intensest parts—the scolding and denunciation of Creusa, the first interview with Jason, and the scene in which she tries to win her children. This is one of the finest points of the play—perhaps it is the finest point—and is capable of being rendered with immense effect, without overstepping the limits of the most conservative taste. The husband, making terms with the wife in order to be rid of her, proposes that she take one of their children, and leave the other with him and Creusa. She cannot choose, and in her perplexity throws the choice on the children themselves. They, having learned to love the comfort and tenderness of their new mother, stand motionless by her side. The real mother then begins to plead, and to plead ineffectually. She sinks from her pride, forgets the presence she is in, implores, coaxes, puts forth all the fondness of a passionate heart, loses herself in the effort to recover the boys, whom her terrible emotions had frightened away. The hearts of the audience are ready to melt in their bosom at that scene. They are full of tears. They would have pardoned any exaggeration. They expected exaggeration in a play where people and situations were all exaggerated. Indeed, nature demanded more than they could have imagined. Ristori was, through it all, stately, proper and cold. We saw the same scene better done years ago by an actress whose name is not to be written on the same sheet of paper with Ristori's—we mean Matilda Heron; there was no mother, and no great actress. On the second representation of "Medea" this was vastly improved; but still it was not all that it should have been. There was the actress, the artist, but not the genius.

In "Mary Stuart" the art rose to a higher level; it was all but consummate, it came near being bewitching. Now and then a flash of genius broke through it and startled the audience out of the quietly charming mood in which the actress placed and kept them. But the prevailing impression was not that of genius. Singularly fine gifts under singularly perfect training explained all the effects that were produced without calling the divine spirit into requisition. Madame Ristori is a gifted woman. Her person is fine, her carriage noble, her head well planted on her shoulders, her arms and hands handsome, her face mobile and expressive. She has a voice of wonderful compass and power, of rich melodious quality, of the utmost flexibility. These gifts she has cultivated to the last point of culture. She has studied hard, with the aid of the best models. Nothing could be more delicious than her articulation; no elocution could be more exquisite in tone and balance. Her declamation is superb—never, under any circumstances, verging on rant or fastidious. Her bearing is bold enough for exigencies, but it never suggests a shuffle, a hitch, or a strut. Her gesture is profuse, incessant, affluent in variety of motion, but it is always graceful and it always has a meaning. Her form is supple, her muscles are perfectly under control. In a word, she is completely furnished for her profession. Nature and art could do little more, except make her beautiful; but they have bestowed the inimitable command of expression which more than makes amends for beauty of feature. Is she, then, all that her worshippers think she is? No one can be. Is she peerless, as Rachel was, in her way? We are not ready to grant it yet. Is she a woman of genius as well as a most elaborate artist? We hope she is; we have a suspicion that she may be, but we shall wait before deciding that she is.

(From The Nation, Oct. 11).

As one thing must be defined against another, so the world will have it that Ristori must be defined against Rachel. Now, genius was the characteristic of Rachel. She possessed the divine power of calling into being the persons whose actions and emotions she portrayed. Her characters were, in every distinguished instance, creations of her own. They were nothing till she touched them. They had haunted the stage as classical anatomies, stalking lay-figures parading heaps of turgid declamation, shades of heroines, half mythological, that ogled and posed, strutted and glided through a long succession of romantic situations; but the little humanity there was in them at first had been vexed by the traditions of the players till only ghosts remained. These tormented manes which Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire had recovered for dramatic or sentimental purpose, but had been forced to let go again, she revived, clothed in actual flesh and blood, animated with living souls, and made powers in the world of passion. Her great triumphs were achieved by the force of her own imagination, which caused things which were not to be as though they were. Her historical characters were weak in proportion as history gave them ready-made into her hands. Her most finished works were those for which she had no material but the fire of her soul.

This creative achievement implied the highest order of dramatic genius. She first called the characters into being, she then identified herself with them and gave them existence; finally, with consummate art, she presented them glowing with animation to her audiences. At her call the graves yielded up their dead.

This first power we saw no evidence of in Ristori, nor have we discovered it yet. Whether or no she possesses it she has given the public no opportunity for judging. She has appeared in three characters, and they were ready-made for her. The first, Medea, is not historical, but it is even more definite than if it were. The traditional events in her career are thrown out with a force that compels interpretation. The expression of the situations cannot be missed; the passions lie in great masses on the surface unsusceptible of modification; the contrasts of emotion are sudden, violent, precipitate, allowing the least possible opportunity for the insertion of graceful touches of color and shade. An artist might, through weakness, fail to portray the character in all its terrible energies of feeling, but no artist could fail to comprehend it. The exercise of the creative art is forestalled by the classical dictionary. If it be true that Ristori's costume in this part was designed for her by Ary Scheffer, her originality must suffer from that additional deduction. In Mary Stuart, imagination is forestalled by history. About few persons do we know so much. We have her portraits, her costumes, pictures of her habits and manners. The events of her history are a familiar tale. Her mental traits have been presented as faithfully as her features. Her moral character is no secret. What is there for an actress to do? Literally nothing but to dress the part with such skill as she can command and make the historical figure step down from the canvas. This Ristori does with marvellous address as we have cordially said. Taste and culture can do no more. No doubt this is the Mary Stuart we have all read of. So she looked; so she spoke; so she conducted herself; so she saddened, grew old, and died. The delineation is exquisite, but it is a copy, not an original.

The same, and even more, may be said of Elizabeth of England. There is romance about Mary; about her there is none. She stands in a blaze of light. Her wardrobe has been ransacked; we know how many dresses she had. The microscope has been applied to her disposition. The chemists have had her motives under their biting acids. As if this were not enough, the ingenious playwright Giacometti, to cut off all possible misapprehension, has arranged his situations and thrown out his points in such a manner that the wayfaring player, though a fool, could not err. Any reader of sign-boards must know precisely what is to be done at every turn. The text is all in italics. We went, therefore, to the theatre with no faintest expectation of seeing a display of creative genius. How could we? Where should it come in? We looked for art of the highest order, for gorgeousness of dress, for velvets, laces, diamonds, and gold. We looked for a full outward impersonation of the great queen in bearing and gesture, for a marvellous play of feature, and the most exquisite gradation of intellectual light and shade. All this we had in measure exceeding our anticipation—a trifle too much, perhaps.

But we had more. We had genuine genius—of the second grade, indeed, but still genius. The first grade was, as we have said, out of the question. There was no room for it. But genius of the second grade; the genius which identifies the actress with the character and makes that real, was there. Ristori did not play Elizabeth; she was Elizabeth; the queen, there in person. Not Giacometti's Elizabeth either, though, of course, that mainly; but something more sound and just than that. Here she toned down the playwright's gasconade by her sense of truth; there she enlarged it by her power of association. She threw into her by play an immense deal not of study merely, but of intuitive perception. She filled up the interstices with flashes of imagination. She read history between her author's lines, and used him as a tool in her hands. It is unnecessary to specify instances. They were so many that the specification would be tiresome. Suffice it to say that the points were all hers. The play fairly sparkled with imagination. A bright mind peeped out in every speech. It was at work in the woman, and apparently not on her stage effects or her author's prosaic language, but on the problems that vexed the soul of Elizabeth herself in her day. The illusion would have been complete if the other actors had done well. It was powerful in spite of them. The audience, for the first time, sat spell-bound. When the curtain fell, it fell not on a scene in a play, but on a scene in England's history; and when, with exquisitely bad taste, in accordance with an exquisitely bad custom, they called the actress before the curtain in her own proper character, it was a shock to see not Queen Elizabeth, but Madame Ristori.

Such power of self-identification with a part is exceedingly rare. Ordinary actors can produce a momentary illusion of the senses by the aid of scenery and clothing, hair-dressing and cosmetics. Players of eminent talent carrying these helps to their perfection, and adding to them cultivated personal graces, facility of pantomime and ready tact, can carry the illusion further and sustain it longer; they can even hide themselves completely behind their assumed mask. But to think the part out, to feel it out, to live for the time in it, and let its life alone appear; to reproduce it as an actual man or woman, is a very different thing. Talent can dress a character, but only genius can put the character into the dress; and the genius that can do that might, for aught we see, do more. Why should not the perfect reproducer be able to produce? Both processes demand imagination, and the same kind of imagination, that, namely, which —"bodies forth

The forms of things unknown."

In the latter case the process begins a little further back; but to change the "airy nothing" into a person would seem as arduous and delicate an undertaking as to give it "a local habitation and a name." Nobody at this day could present an original conception of Queen Elizabeth. Rachel probably could have done this no better than Ristori. The most exacting criticism can demand no more than an intensely real impersonation of any one consistent idea. This they who saw Ristori's Elizabeth certainly had. The great queen treading down the loving woman parts of her in the imagined interest of her queenliness, and then dying in her queenliness because the loving woman part would not die, never so swept those people with the fringe of her garments before. She fairly shook their hearts.

But Ristori cannot give us so much without compelling us to expect more. Nothing but the highest reach of genius will content us now. We shall return to the subject.

Music Abroad.

Italy.

NAPLES. "Music's last agony at Naples":—such is the heading of a letter, dated Sept. 24, 1866, which we translate from the Parisian journal Le Ménestrel.

"It is a long time since I have addressed you a musical correspondence. It is long since any music has been made at Naples. In this respect no city fares to-day so badly as this our city which was once so well off! The political events of these last years have been fatal to the musical art in the south of Italy. The theatres of music, now under one pretext, and now another, are constantly closed. In spite of the cholera there are actually seven active theatres here, and not one which gives a single petite acte of opera buffa. . . It is désolant!

"The Conservatorio is disorganized from top to bottom. Grave disorders have broken out in this establishment and several pupils have been put in prison. Pickets of gens d'armes are stationed before the doors. These disorders touch so closely upon politics that it is not possible for me to explain to you the causes.

"If theatrical music is put aside, religious music has no better fate. The chapel of the royal palace is in a state of utter disorganization. Some churches possess organs, to be sure, but where are the organists? . . . Certain parishes, and of the most important, content themselves with a simple Harmonium, like the village chapels.

"I will pass in silence the so-called chamber music. In spite of some laudable efforts, badly recompensed by success, one never has the opportunity of hearing a good Quartet. Besides, it is a kind of music completely antipathetic to Neapolitans, who seem to have no comprehension of it.

"Choral societies, to this day unknown in Italy, are not even the object of a desire on the part of the Neapolitan musicians, and I do not know that they have ever had a thought of founding a single one.

"Naples does not possess a concert hall.

"Some military bands of the national guard, which, fortunately, are not too bad, let us hear marches and polkas. That is all! No other music unless it be the orgues de Barbarie (street organs). These instruments have been multiplying for a few years.

"In this land, where music once was held in honor, they have not even raised a bust to such men as Durante, Cimarosa, Paisiello, who have made their ungrateful country so illustrious. Although in Naples several squares and streets have no fixed name, the idea has never occurred to any one to give to some of these squares or streets the names of these great musicians. I do not speak of foreigners: they would cry out scandal if Beethoven or Hérold should receive the slightest honor. And while at Paris, Rossini and so many other celebrated Italians have their names engraved on marble or bronze, Cimarosa, the Neapolitan and patriot, becomes as unknown to the actual Neapolitans as such or such a Chinese mandarin.

"Whatever has relation to musical art is fallen as low as possible. Nothing, absolutely nothing can give an idea of the profound night that envelopes everything that touches this divine art nearly or remotely. The obscurity is such that one asks himself how it will ever be possible to dissipate such thick darkness.

"Certainly music in Italy is in its decadence; but in the North there still remain materials which sustain the crumbling edifice and may cause it to rise again. At Naples there is no further question of decadence—it is annihilation! The few true artists that we yet possess bitterly deplore this state of things without finding any remedy!

"It would not be impossible, for the rest, for music to become almost a matter of indifference to our country. The following fact makes it supposable:

"Last summer, in the midst of the general dearth of music, a few good musicians, veritable waifs of the musical wreck of Naples, conceived the idea of uniting and forming an orchestra. Most of these musicians came from the San Carlo theatre, habitually closed.

"They chose a ravishing garden, that of the palazzo Chiatamone, a poetic habitation bathed by the sea, situated in the very centre of the most elegant quarter of Naples, and where Alexander Dumas had installed himself during his abode here.

"This garden received some extra embellishments; garlands of fire illuminated it; its great oaks projected their shadows over the waves which die out gently at their feet. From there, the gulf presents itself in all its splendid beauty. On one side, Pausilippo charms the eye with its green shades and its villas suspended over the sea; on the other, Vesuvius is outlined; in the distance, it is the mountains of Castellamare, Meta, Sorrento, &c.; in front, the isle of Capri, with strange forms, in some sort shuts in the gulf ploughed by the barks of fishermen casting their nets, by night, to the light of resinous torches.

"When the pale lustre of the moon comes to light up this region, one of the most lovely in the world, it costs no effort of the imagination to believe oneself transplanted beyond our planet, into one of those imaginary worlds created by the Arabian fancy.

"And the sonorous orchestra, resounding under the foliage, mingled the strains of Rossini, of Bellini, with the intoxicating perfumes of the gulf.

"There too you found, in profusion, exquisite sherbets, the savory fruits of our climates; in short, all that art and nature can offer of delights had been united in this enchanted spot.

"The entrée of this paradise cost—1 franc!—How long, think you, were these feasts of music and of nature able to last?—Eight days! At the end of eight days, the garden had again become deserted, silent; its gates were closed! The receipts had not one single time covered expenses—and Naples has five hundred thousand inhabitants!

"En revanche, a single Pulcinello theatre has not been found enough; several have been opened. Since the closing of the Jardin musical there has been no music heard in Naples except the band of the national guard, which I have just mentioned, and which is only applauded when it executes "The Railroad" or the Garibaldi hymn.—Is it or is it not time to exclaim: 'Music is dying! music is dead!'

STUTTGART, OCT. 1. Here, as everywhere, the war had closed all the theatres and interrupted, after one or two representations, the success of Herr Abert's new opera, "Astorga." We were present at a reprise, to which they had given all the éclat of a first representation. Abert is the author of a Symphony, "Columbus," and of an opera, "King Enzo," two works for some time popular, the first especially, in Germany. He is a young man, thirty-two years old. Attached since his childhood to the royal theatre of Stuttgart, in the capacity of contrabassist, he possesses, independently of his qualities as a composer, consummate experience in the management of orchestral forces. His last work, Astorga, is a serious score in which, by the side of a marked tendency for purely Italian melody, there shine out those qualities of general composition, those effects of ensemble, those daring feats of harmony and instrumentation which belong peculiarly to modern Germany.

In spite of these apparent fluctuations, in spite of this eclecticism with which some have reproached him, his work bears the real stamp of originality. Inspiration, thought abound with him; his melody is large, powerful, expressive, and it is his own. His orchestration, I have said, is that of a master. Before two years the French public will have applauded Astorga. The tenor charged with the principal part in Abert's opera is named Sontheim. Past the age of forty, he has the fresh and equal voice of a tenor of twenty years. Add to these qualities a superb power, such as I have only met with in Franchini; a sure method, a great amplitude of style, and you will have an idea of this artist, whom an engagement for life chains to the theatre of Stuttgart, with the admirable prospect, some ten years hence, of a pension of—three thousand francs!! O virtuous Germany.—Curr. of Le Ménestrel.

BERLIN. The festival week in Berlin, during which "our victorious warriors" re-entered the city, was celebrated in regal manner at the opera. The festival began with an introductory "Victory's Festival Sounds" (Siegesfestklänge) composed by Kapellmeister Dorn—a kind of triumphal march leading to a sweet melody with harp accompaniments, and ending with the choral "Nun danket Alle Gott," the choral being sung behind the curtain. This was followed by a Prologue written by a veteran of the "War of Liberty," and spoken by Frau Jachmann: the prologue created great enthusiasm. During its delivery the King appeared and the audience rose and received with evident veneration (sichtliche Ehrfurcht) the monarch who had led his own host to undying glory. A new drops scene gave rise to repeated acclamation: it represents the Brandenburg Gate with the Goddess of Victory surrounded with sunlight; in the foreground are groups of trophies with the subscription in golden letters of the names, Schleswig-Holstein, Hanover, Electoral Hesse, Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, Nassau; two eagles hold the wreath of branches with which the trophies are bound. The patriotic play, "Lenore" by Carl von Holtei, carried the spectators back from William I. to Frederick II., who commenced the establishment of Prussian supremacy. After the play a cantata for the occasion, "Prussia's Honor," was performed with tableaux; it is the composition of Kapellmeister Taubert, written in appropriately martial and elevating style. Its reception was, to say the least, stormy.

The place of Professor of Music in the University of Berlin, made vacant by the death of Marx, has been conferred on H. Bellerman, already known by a treatise on Counterpoint, &c.

London.

ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS, Sept. 22.—A new violinist, Herr Wilhelmj, appeared on Monday, on an engagement said to be limited to the present week. The playing of Herr Wilhelmj produced an extraordinary sensation, and indeed merited all the applause it obtained. He is a thorough artist of undoubted accomplishments; his speciality consists in playing a succession of chords in thirds, octaves and tenths, with a precision, rapidity and clearness we never heard equalled. His marvellous violoncello effects on the fourth string are also worthy of notice. He plays Paganini's Concerto and Ernst's fantasia, "Airs Hongrois," and both create the greatest excitement. We trust Herr Wilhelmj may be induced to extend his engagement. Monday was an Italian night, devoted to Spontini, Cherubini, Verdi and Rossini. The overtures to "Nourmahad," "Gaillaume Tell" and "Les Deux Journées" were played, and a selection from "Ernani." The rest was filled by the March of the Israelites from "Eli," a fantasia on pianoforte, airs from "Lucrezia Borgia" played by Mlle. Krebs, the "Cujus Animam" played on the cornet by Mr. Reynolds, and the usual songs in which Mlle. Carlotta Patti revels. Thursday night was given to Mendelssohn. It included the overture to "Ruy Blas," the Rondo Capriccioso in E minor for Mlle. Krebs, the whole of the Italian Symphony, and a violin concerto for Master Emile Sauret.

Oct. 6.—The concerts grow more attractive as their duration increases. What, however, must be especially gratifying to the lovers of real music is the fact that the classical nights, mostly given on Thursdays, draw greater crowds than other nights, even than Mr. Mellon's pet nights, the "Saturday Volunteer," the meaning of which he has yet failed to expound to curious inquirers. The programme on Thursday night was devoted to the works of Mozart, from which no great difficulty was experienced in making a first-rate selection, as the following must be pronounced: Overture—Idomeneo; canzone, "Voi che sapete"—Le Nozze di Figaro; Fugue in C minor for orchestra; aria, "Fin ch' an dal vino"—Don Giovanni; Symphony in C, No. 6 (the Jupiter); Duet, "La ci darem"—Don Giovanni; Notturmo for two oboes, two horns, two clarinets and two bassoons; and overture—Il Flauto Magico. The symphony was finely played and an attempt was made to encore the slow movement. The Fugue in C minor was repeated in answer to loud and prolonged acclamations. Is not this a manifestation of the increasing taste and love for good music? Both overtures were executed to perfection, and the "mighty" Flauto Magico applauded to the echo. The opening movement of the Notturno, the andante, is worthy of Mozart in his tenderest and most inspired mood.

Paris.

The Orchestra's correspondent, Sept. 25, writes;

The only new event I have to note in the musical world is the re-opening of the Bouffes Parisiens, which took place on Saturday. This theatre is now under the management of M. Varcollier, the husband of Mme. Ugaldi, who was the chief attraction of the first night. Four operettas were given, the best being the late A. Adam's "Pantins de Violette." The great Offenbach has withdrawn the light of his countenance—and his repertoire, from the theatre; and some people are ungrateful enough to think "so much the better." Whether the public began to have enough of that trashy Pont Neuf class of music, which the celebrated master has made so much in vogue during the last ten or twelve years, or not, remains to be seen; but the opinion that we have been "Offenbached" sufficiently to impair our health is tolerably prevalent. With such an artist as Mme. Ugaldi to lead his troupe, and with such composers as Duprato, E. Jonas, Durand, and others who really know how to write (and are musicians, not mountebanks), there really is a chance of success for M. Varcollier, even though the protecting hand of the former manager is withdrawn, and the strains of the "Pont des Soupirs" "Trombal-ca-zar" &c., are no longer heard within the walls of his theatre.

Of course the Italian is a subject of conversation, and we wait the opening (on the 2nd October) with impatience. Patti is decidedly engaged for the whole season: the salary is stated to be 200,000 francs (£8000) for the seven months. Mlle. Lagrue is not new to Paris; she was attached to the Grand Opera in 1852, and came out in Halévy's "Juif Errant." Since that time she has taken the Italian repertoire and has gained a position on the Continent, particularly at Naples and Vienna. She is to create here Donizetti's "Maria Suarda," a work written for the San Carlo at Naples, but interdicted by the censure after the last full rehearsal; it was subsequently given at Rome under the title of "Buondelmonte," and was performed with its original name at the San Carlo about a year and a half ago. We shall have Fraschini, but for six weeks only, at the close of the season. The burden of sustaining the tenor parts will in the mean time fall upon MM. Pancani and Nicolini, unless ill. Naudin should return to the place he never should have quitted. Mlle. Zeiss is the only contralto on the list at present. "La Sonambula" with Mlle. Patti and Nicolini will probably be given on the opening night. "Saffo," by Pacini, is announced for Mlle. Lagrue: this opera was given some twenty years ago with Griesi, Rubini, and Lablache, but failed to attract much attention.

We pick up the following floating bits of musical intelligence:

The members of the Hanover Court Theatre (about 300 persons in all), have received a notification that the King of Prussia undertakes the theatrical administration in future, in the stead of King George, and that in all other particulars the theatre will remain on the same footing. Old contracts remain in force; the partly unpaid salaries will commence from the 1st September. Herr v. Hülsen, the General-Intendant of the Berlin Court Theatre, has taken up his post in Hanover.

The dramatic season of Weimar has commenced with Goethe's "Egmont," and Beethoven's "Fidelio."

On the anniversary of the late King of Saxony's death, Mozart's "Requiem" was performed at the Catholic Church, Dresden. Frau Bürde-Ney sang the solo parts.

Meyerbeer has been repeated in rapid succession during the past week in Berlin: "Africaine," "Prophet," "Huguenots," and "Robert" have followed each other uninterruptedly.

The Pergola, Florence, opens with the "Africaine."

Mlle. Artot is in Paris awaiting the return of Verdi, to study with him one of the two prima donna parts which he has written in "Don Carlos."

Mme. Viardot Garcia has given a concert in Baden, at which Mme. Schumann, Signor Zucchini and others assisted.

The Scala, Milan, will open with a new opera, "I Figli di Borgia," by the young composer, Strigelli.

The Independence Belye announced recently that a new lyrical theatre was about to be built in Paris under the "vocal" of the old Grétry, whose speciality would be the performance of works which were public property, and that thus the non-payment of author's rights would serve instead of a subvention. This story is inaccurate. The Theatre-Grétry is being founded for the express purpose of playing contemporary authors; in fact it will be prohibited the management under the articles of Constitution to put on pieces belonging to the domaine public. The Opera Lyrique possesses so large a stock of the old authors and composers that it can rarely produce new ones. The Theatre-Grétry on the other hand will be reserved for those composers who have already given proof of their talents on other stages, and by obtaining the prix de Rome.

Auber is at work on an opera called "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur," words by MM. Dennery and Cormon.

The violinist Wilhelmj, whose talent has aroused so much interest at Mellon's Concerts, is a German by birth, the son of a Wiesbaden barrister; he finished his studies in the Leipzig Conservatorium.

The Vienna Opera possesses at the present time not less than eight tenors, all comparatively unknown. There are but two tenors at the Berlin establishment, but they are Wachtel and Niemann.

Alfred Jaell is passing his honeymoon at Interlaken, where, despite many seductive offers of engagements, he intends remaining till the 20th, a date on which the series of philharmonic concerts at Basle and other Swiss towns commences.

According to the Worcester Journal, an arrangement was made by the stewards of the late festival with Mr. Otto Goldschmidt for that gentleman to write an oratorio on the subject of Ruth, specially for the occasion. Unfortunately, Mr. Goldschmidt's continental engagements prevented him from completing the work in time, and deprived the festival of what would have been an interesting and important feature.

Rossini has, during his summer sojourn in Passy, finished the orchestration of his "Petite Messe Solennelle," which was twice performed with pianoforte accompaniment, at the house of Count Pillet Will (Rossini's banker). The great master's last work is a "Hymne à l'Empereur," for baritone solo, with choral and orchestral arrangement and incidental military band. It is hoped that this work will be performed at the opening of the Paris Exhibition. During that season possibly the "Messe" may be heard, too, if the choice of the solo singers is to the liking of the maestro.

Symphony Concerts.

The solid part, the most important and most interesting part of our musical season rapidly draws near. Good orchestral concerts—Philharmonic Concerts, as they call them in some cities—are what more than any other give the musical character to a season or a place. These set the tone of all the music; if these are high in character, are really artistic, classical and noble, free from shallowness and clap-trap, other forms of public music-making, though unconsciously, will feel their influence. Without the Philharmonic concerts and the Oratorios, our musical season is miscellaneous, and without high aim or standard, doing little for Art culture.

The second season of the "Symphony Concerts," which under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association met with such favor last year, and gave signal demonstration of the fact that concerts composed purely and exclusively of the highest kind of music, concerts in which none but names of unquestioned masters, men of genius, figure, can delight large audiences, is now definitely announced. The success of last year warrants an increase of the number of concerts; there are to be eight of them, instead of six; and even more, we have no doubt, are called for and would be well sustained in point of audience, were it possible to give such feasts of music without more preparation than our busy musicians can find time for. The plan of the concerts is essentially the same as before; in the composing of the programmes there will reign the same spirit, the same loyalty to pure ends of art, the same regard to unity and fitness in the selection of pieces and the combining and contrasting of the various elements; always seeking to realize something that is beautiful and noble, something inspiring and elevating; to bring out beautiful and great works, real music, rather than such as ministers to the vanity of performers. Art, the poetry of Art, and not dazzling virtuosity, is, as it should be, the object of these concerts. If all other concert-givers cater to the fashions of the day, to the love of novelty and showy superficiality, and make up their programmes mainly to show off the singer or the player, and try to win the crowd by crowding into an evening more distinguished artists than can work together with any sort of unity, making a senseless, dissipating medley of things which do not belong together, then there is all the more need of one standard series of concerts, which shall keep entirely to good music, and ensure an opportunity of hearing and of knowing the best works of the great masters, even at the risk of some complaint of exclusiveness. These Symphony Concerts are designed to be our academic, standard concerts, so to speak, and to keep the highest, the unquestioned models of Art, and masterworks of genius, ever fresh in mind. By abstaining from much which other concerts give, these concerts serve the cause of catholicity of taste, of hospitality to new composers and new schools, better than they could otherwise; for, by keeping the true beacon lights still shining amid all the bewildering confusion, they make it safe to go and hear the new and untried things for which plenty of opportunities are always likely to be offered elsewhere. The taste that has been formed in a true school is proof against the novelties and contrarieties that otherwise mislead and dissipate. Thus schooled, or rather thus experienced, deeply penetrated with the perception and the love of what in the highest sense is beautiful and enduring, one can afford to listen to new things and learn; then curiosity becomes safe. And this, we take it, is just what the world has always meant in advocating what are called "classical" models, "classical" schools or tastes. He whose culture has been classical, can best of all men afford to be liberal and lend an ear to whatever claims a hearing upon any ground of new beauty, power, originality, or successes elsewhere. But the opportunities of such culture, the classical or academic, normal opportunities must first exist. A thorough, intimate lover of Shakspeare is in no danger of being carried away by a poor clap-trap sensation drama, that has its run for the day with the multitude; on the other hand he is the most likely to detect the pearl of genius in that which is common clay to others. So a community who have grown familiar with Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and whatever is congenial and in keeping with these, through opportunities of enjoying them without distracting invitations of another sort, will be in a condition to listen to all sorts of composers and all kinds of music and give all their due. But the one standard opportunity of culture, pure and without distraction, admitting nothing but the best, must first be secured. When you have heard a language spoken only in the best society, until you know it and possess it in its purity, then and only then it becomes safe for you to take an interest in provincial dialects; indulge our curiosity in them as we may, we must still keep clear somewhere "a well of English pure and undefiled." Just so with Music.

Now this is the ground on which the "Symphony Concerts" were first attempted by the Harvard Musical Association. They were designed to fill a place not occupied in our ordinary and very miscellaneous provisions for hearing music. The orchestral means of Boston, to be sure, were limited. To make the most of these means, and employ them to the best advantage in the production of Symphonies, Concertos, Overtures, the genial creations of master spirits in the tone-world,—this was their design; and this was to bring delight and culture to all music-lovers, and at the same time to give our drudging, multifariously occupied musicians chance and encouragement to work together now and then as artists in the true spirit of their noble art. The first step in the working plan was to guaranty to them the best kind of audience, the members of the Association and their friends forming the nucleus, with attractive social power enough, together with the musical attraction, to gradually almost fill the Music Hall. The same nucleus, the same guaranty, is again secured beforehand, even before the concerts were publicly announced; and this to the musicians also means the guaranty of fair pay, better than they get elsewhere. Thanks to the Symphony Concerts, it is now proved in Boston that the best music (dear to cultivated tastes) both pleases best and pays best.

As to the last year's programmes, if they were in any sense exclusive, kept to a fastidiously high, pure standard, the reason and necessity for such a policy have been, we trust, sufficiently explained. Reasons and theories apart, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. Did any one complain that those concerts were dry? Did any find it a severe entertainment? When had we ever such variety, and so blended that each thing helped the other? And when will it be possible to exhaust our riches, if we keep on working the same veins? The greater variety which others idly call for is seen in such miscellanies as the Bateman programmes, for instance, where one thing has so little to do with another that everything gets encored and repeated, and all unity, all proportion, all temperate duration of indulgence is dissipated and destroyed; it is musical gormandizing, and in great part on sweetmeats which impair digestion. Programmes artistically made, composed, hardly admit of encores; as well encore a feature in a portrait; the encore appetite is blind, forgets what goes before and after in the greed of momentary indulgence; the picture in which it meddles becomes a monstrosity, the programme a medley, the feast a glut, with headache the next morning. The last year's programmes may have erred once or twice by too great length; but unity, variety, beauty, inspiration they did not lack; and the very general voice of satisfaction is already confirmed in the eager inquiries and demand for tickets for this second season.

It is confidently believed that the concerts will be quite as interesting and as good as they were last winter. The elements employed will be, as we have said, about the same. Only the male chorus pieces (as a standard feature) are dispensed with, the Committee being convinced that the results hardly justified the cost of time and trouble. Had it been possible to organize those sixty or eighty voices into a regular singing Club for constant practice, plenty of promise might be seen in those hasty and imperfect efforts of last year; and as it was, the Mendelssohn "Antigone" choruses and others fell not wholly short of the impression due intrinsically to such choice and noble music. Another year, perhaps, by taking early measures, it may be possible to enrich these concerts with that fine element, and even to have a mixed chorus, whereby such works as Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," and many other choice things, here seldom or never heard, for orchestra and chorus, may be brought home to us. It may even now be possible, by borrowing a chorus, to give one or two such works. The concerts, then, will consist in the first place of Symphonies, the plan being to give the very best and such as have not been of late most often heard. It is on this last ground only, that we can afford to leave Mendelssohn's two Symphonies to others. Eight concerts do not offer room for many—say nine at the most; and it is proposed to give two or three of Beethoven, certainly the Seventh, and very probably the Ninth with chorus; perhaps also the shortest one, the No. 8, which needs more justice done it than it got last year, in the same concert with a short one by Haydn. Then we must have one by Mozart, probably the "Jupiter." Of Schumann two Symphonies: that in C major introduced to us last winter, and that in D minor, because Schumann's music is now peculiarly the object of growing interest with the truest music lovers, opening deeper and richer as we get acquainted. The great Schubert Symphony must be played again, and we suppose there will be no resisting the demand for Gade in C minor. But these ideas may yet be modified by afterthoughts. Mendelssohn will certainly figure in his most genial orchestral creations, his Overtures; and so will Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, Cherubini and others. The "Genoveva" by Schumann, and the "Fierabras" by Schubert, played here only once before, will very likely be repeated. Under the head of Concertos and other solo performances for piano, violin, &c., we shall certainly be rich in interpreters, even richer than we were before. CARL ROSA, the violinist, who lent such charm last year in the opening concert, is this year engaged for the last, the Bateman concerts claiming him till that time. For pianists there will be not only DRESEL, LEONHARD, LANG and PARKER, but PERABO and PETERSILEA—all resident among us, three of them members of the Harvard—and, it is hoped, also Mr. MILLS. The Concertos were a marked feature in these concerts last year, especially the three by Beethoven. Finally, in lieu of the male chorus, we may get some choice vocal solos with orchestra.

The opening Concert will occur on Friday afternoon, Nov. 23d, and with the following programme: Part I. Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini; Schumann's Concerto in A minor, played by Otto Dresel.—Part II. Seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Weber's Concert-Stück (?) by Mr. Dresel; Overture, No. 3, to Leonora, Beethoven.

The eight concerts will succeed each other once a fortnight as a rule; but between the third and fourth, and between the seventh and eighth, one will be omitted, making four week's interval for better rehearsal of new things. The dates of all the concerts as printed on the back of the season ticket, are as follows: Nov. 23, Dec. 7, Dec. 21, Jan. 18, Feb. 1, Feb. 15, March 1, and March 29.

THE LAST TWO BATEMAN CONCERTS, which just overreached our last review, were among the most interesting of the dozen, although BRIGNOLI had to be excused from one. They demand mention even at this late day, if only on account of the Mozart aria: "Non temer," which was new to all of us, and sung by Mme. PAREPA, with violin obbligato by ROSA. It is not from any opera, but a dramatic scene, with opening recitative, slow cantabile and quick finale, in the high and noble Donna Anna vein. Unluckily the wrong orchestral parts were sent, but with HATTON's nice piano accompaniment and Rosa it was still a rare treat to the few, if not to all. Then we must not forget the Zitti, zitti Trio, the Catalogue song of Leporello, and other capital buffo pieces by FERRARI, the never failing; nor Rosa's playing of the Allegro of the Mendelssohn Concerto, and the lovely Abendlied of Schumann, for which the encore public got revenge in the shape of Paganini things, the Carnival, &c., wherein Rosa proved the match of any other charmer. We cannot recall all the good things; enough to say that the enthusiasm had not at all abated, and that Mr. Bateman feels bound to return to us this winter.

NEXT IN ORDER comes what, if not music, is most nearly related to it, the voice, the musical, expressive accent, the great dramatic art and genius of RISTORI, who will play Medea at the Boston Theatre next Monday, to be followed by Maria Stuart, Queen Elizabeth, Judith, and her other great parts during two weeks. It will be a rare opportunity, although the plays will be in the Italian; those who would improve it thoroughly must join Col. Maggi's Italian reading classes for the study of the plays beforehand. It was our lot when abroad to see Ristori only once—a memorable experience! It was in Maria Stuart, and the state of mind in which it left us is very nearly expressed in what is said of her after the same play in the article which we have copied from the Nation. Observe, the critic surrenders himself cautiously, but that the impression of her genius grows with him as she goes on. Go, all who can, and see and hear Ristori. If your acquaintance with the Italian language goes no further than the opera librettos, you will still feel that you are listening to human speech in its perfection, to say nothing of soul, imagination, passion.

Meanwhile the Music Hall is closed to music for some weeks by a Catholic Fair. As soon as the ban is lifted, "Parlor Opera" awaits its turn there, beginning on Thursday evening, Nov. 8. There will be nice scenic arrangements, a carefully composed little orchestra, conducted by Mr. WHITING, and Don Pasquale will be performed by Miss FANNY RIDDEL, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY (tenor), Mr. RUDOLPHSEN (baritone), and Dr. GUIMETTE as the gony old Don. Those who have witnessed the rehearsals speak enthusiastically of the style in which it will be done. A fortnight later, probably, Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" (Heimkehr aus der Fremde) will be given for the first time in Boston. The business manager, Mr. PECK, sees great encouragement ahead.

On the 23d of November comes the first "Symphony Concert," and, probably on the following Sunday evening, the first Oratorio of the season, "St. Paul," by the Handel and Haydn Society, making that the week of the beginning of great things.

Mr. HERMANN DAUM intends giving during the coming season, three Beethoven matinees, beginning in November, and following at intervals of four weeks. He proposes to have both vocal and instrumental assistance, and will present some of the Sonatas for piano and violin, piano and cello, &c.

"JUDAS MACCABEUS" formed part of the programme of a five-days Musical Convention in Worcester this week, Carl Zerrahn conducting, and Mr. Solon Wilder, of Bangor, leading in other exercises. These "Conventions" are growing in importance, in fact beginning to approach the dignity of musical Festivals. Though they began, years ago, in rather a trading spirit, opening markets for new psalm books, &c., they have also developed a good deal of musical enthusiasm and diffused not a little musical culture among the yeomanry and daughters of New England. We shall yet have our choral societies from our own plains and mountains rivaling the Yorkshiremen of the old country.

PHILADELPHIA. The City Item tells us:

The taste for classical music in Philadelphia is certainly growing rapidly. For a number of years the Germania Orchestra has given us a taste of the great masters, but now there is a desire for a series of Symphony Concerts, like those of New York and Boston; and to meet this wish, Messrs. Charles H. Jarvis and Charles M. Schmitz, two of our best musicians, have started a subscription for these concerts, to be given very soon. The best vocal and instrumental talent will be secured, and selections from Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and many others, will be given. The orchestra will be most carefully selected, and will number from forty to fifty musicians. Thus, the works of the great masters will be finely interpreted. Under the energetic baton of Mr. Schmitz, who is well known as one of our finest musicians—the Symphony Concerts cannot fail to be a great success.

MARETEK commenced a successful opera season of fifteen nights last week at the Academy of Music, with "Crispino e la Comare." The Item finds the instrumentation noisier and brassier than anything except Petrella's Jone—Verdi lovely in comparison; but cannot praise Ronconi too much for his great impersonation of the cobbler.

His make up was admirable, and his execution of the music very artistic. Without descending to buffoonery, he made the part of the consequential Crispino one of the most original and amusing I have ever seen. He is a wonderful man, and his comedy is as fresh and full of vivacity as that of a young singer flushed with his first triumphs.

Miss Kellogg, as Annetta, was very successful. She is full of grace, and her execution of the brilliant music of the part is deserving of high praise. The music is well suited to her high, flexible voice.

Signor Testa, as the Count, had but little to do, but sang very agreeably and looked very handsome. Bellini and Antonucci, as the Doctors, were excellent. Miss Stockton was well suited to the music of the Comare. The chorus was large and powerful, and the ensembles were very spiritedly given.

Crispino was not prefaced by an overture. Italian operas seldom are. The orchestra was well drilled, and did well. Altogether Crispino was a success, and should be repeated.

On Tuesday Verdi's well known "Trovatore" was given, with a fine cast, introducing Senora Carmen Proch, Mazzoleni, Mme. Testa, Bellini, and others. Verdi's brilliant music sounded very agreeably after its rest of some two or three years in Philadelphia.

The Senora Carmen Proch rendered the difficult role of Leonora with superb effect. She is young and inclined to embonpoint, but is very graceful, with an expressive face and full, passionate voice. The severe music did not tell on her energies, and the last act was brilliantly rendered. Altogether her debut was a complete triumph. The other artistes sang exceedingly well—especially Mme. Testa, who threw into the characteristic music of Azucena all the force and concentration necessary to a thoroughly fine rendition. The whole opera passed off unusually well, and was warmly applauded throughout.

To night (Wednesday) Auber's superb "Fra Diavolo" will be given. It will be remembered that Auber, a couple of years ago, revised this opera, and added a scena for soprano, &c. All these additions will be given by the Italians. "Fra Diavolo" is one of their best performed operas.

On Thursday, "Sonnambula" will introduce Miss Hanck, a protégée of Jerome, of New York, who is said to possess a delightful voice. Signor Baragli, a new tenor de grazia, will appear.

Next week there will be a grand programme. We are promised "L'Etoile du Nord," never performed in Philadelphia, and one of Meyerbeer's best comic operas. We are also to have "Les Huguenots," "Faust," "Robert," "Ernani," "Don Giovanni," and many others. Perhaps Mr. Maretzek's great success may induce him to remain longer than fifteen nights.

"BLIND TOM" has called forth some remarkable testimonials in London. These for instance!

"In justice to Blind Tom I have much pleasure in stating that I think him marvellously gifted by nature. I happened to be present at a performance of his at Southsea, and at the request of Mr. W. P. Howard began to test his abilities by extemporizing a short rhythmical piece, which he imitated to perfection, thus proving beyond all doubt that he did not impose upon the public by preparation.

"I then went so far as to play him that part of my 'Recollections of Ireland' in which the three melodies are blended, and even that he imitated with most of its intricacies and changes.

"Having tested his powers of analyzing chords, and found them all that I could desire, I next put my hands on the keys at random, and was surprised to hear him name every note of such flagrant discord. Tom's technical acquirements are very remarkable, and his entertainment full of interest for the musician and amateur.

"I. MOSCHELES.

"Southsea, Sept. 11, 1856."

"I have this day, for the first time, heard Blind Tom play on the pianoforte, and I was very much astonished and pleased by his performance. His natural musical gifts seem to me quite marvellous, and the manner in which he repeated several pieces I played to him, which he had evidently never heard before, was most remarkable. Perhaps the most striking feature was the extraordinary quickness with which he named any notes struck by me on the piano, either singly or simultaneously, however discordant they might be. I also named to him several notes, choosing the most difficult and perplexing intervals; these he instantly sang with perfect truth of intonation, although they might have puzzled a well-educated musician. Altogether, Blind Tom seems to me a most singular and inexplicable phenomenon.

"CHARLES HALLÉ.

"Greenhays, 27th Sept., 1866."

A BELL THAT HAS TOLLED A TALE.—The bell heard in the first act of Don Juan d'Autriche, at the Theatre Française, is one of those which on the 24th of August, 1572, gave signal for the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Put up for sale during the Revolution, all the bells of St. Germain l'Auxerrois were bought by a founder named Flauban, who parted with the smallest of them to the theatre just named. It was tolled there for the first time at the theatre in 1801, at the first performance of Edouard en Ecosse, by Alexandre Duval.

A New York correspondent of the London Musical World relates the following story:—"The songstress, Carlotta Zucchi, has gone to Europe, if not with the golden opinions of all sorts of people, with forty thousand gold dollars, which Max Maretzek paid her for her services during the last opera season. And here is a little incident concerning the exit of the prima donna that may be worth your attention, if only as illustrating the growing acuteness of those unpopular persons, the collectors of internal revenue. By some hocus-pocus, known only to themselves, they found out that Zucchi's name was booked on the passenger-list of a steamer, to sail in twenty-four hours after the discovery. There was no time to lose. Uncle Sam's tax-gatherer at once presented himself before the cantatrice, and, in as few words as possible, gave her to understand that on the 40,000 dollars in gold, which the indomitable Max had paid a day or two previously, eighteen hundred dollars and some odd cents was due to the government. The fair Italian demurred. She was not a citizen of this great country; she had never taken the oath of allegiance; she owed nothing to revenue-collectors or anybody else; and, to cut the matter short, it was intimated to the shovel-nosed collector that he might as well be gone about his business: the swindle would not be submitted to. Tax-gatherers, however, are proverbially persistent. The fellow would not be gone. Zucchi took advice, and finally paid the money, in a storm of melodramatic passion, (under protest).

A French paper asserts that in the composition of "Semiramide," Rossini had a collaborator in no less a personage than Metternich. Rossini was directing the Italian Opera at Vienna and was very intimate with the prime minister. One day Metternich called on the maestro, and found him working at the "Semiramide." Looking over the subject in hand the diplomatist found it cold and uninteresting, void of dramatic movement, and much below the subjects into which the great Mozart had infused his spirit. Telling Rossini as much, he set to work singing the "Freuet euch das Leben."

"There my friend," he cried, "why don't you do something like that? Or if you can't, why not introduce this little bit of Mozart into your work?"

Rossini was so taken with the idea, that he conceived the notion of making the passage the dominant motive of his new opera. It was a happy plagiarism; for Metternich himself could not have foreseen how much Rossini would make of the interpolated morsel.

Wagner, it is said, intends converting the story of William Tell into an opera.

Class Songs.

[The following songs were written for a social festival of the Harvard Class of 1832, which took place at the Parker House, on the evening of Oct. 31, 1866. They are both by our old friend and class-mate, the Rev. CHARLES T. BROOKS, of Newport, R. I., who returned a few weeks since from Europe.]

I.

Across the deep, where surges roared,
Unconsciously I flew,
To greet around this festive board
The Class of '32.
The Class of '32, my boys,
The Class of '32;
In memory to live o'er the joys
Of dear old '32.

Full many a sea we all have crossed,
And tempests, not a few,
Of joy and grief our hearts have tossed
Since long gone '32.
Since long gone '32, my boys—
Since long gone '32;
But memory hears through all the noise
The song of '32.

Our ranks are thinned, and thinned our hairs,
But still our hearts are true
To youthful friendships, vows and prayers
That cling round '32.
That cling round '32, my boys,
That cling round '32;
And time forever with the joys
Of the Class of '32.

Earth runs her round, and years their race,
Old scenes give place to new,
But new ones ne'er can take the place
Of the friends of '32.
The friends of '32, my boys,
The friends of '32;
Memory alone repeats the joys
Of the Class of '32.

But Memory in her magic land,
Beneath her cloudless blue,
Still keeps in one unbroken band
The Class of '32.
The Class of '32, my boys,
The Class of '32—
In one unbroken chain the joys
Of the Class of '32.

Then each to each pass on, my friends,
The hand I stretch to you;
We're one till time and memory ends
The boys of '32.
Of dear old '32, my boys,
Of dear old '32,
Till lost in heaven all earthly joys
Will live in '32.

II.

We've come to the end of October,
'Mid falling and fading of leaves,
When mortals are wont to be sober,
And Memory garners her sheaves.
From fields where, in all sorts of weather,
We've labored in sun and in storm,
To-night we are gathered together,
Where the home-light of friendship shines warm.

We see in the fire-light the faces
Of them who are with us no more;
They rise up to take their old places,
And we live the old summer-days o'er.

While the envious Fates hold the spindle,
And wind off and snip off the thread,
We close up our ranks as they dwindle,
And tenderly think of our dead,

Triumphantly think of the greatness
And goodness that watches o'er all,
Brings in the last fruits in their latences,
And notes the pale leaves in their fall—

Of the Love that looks pitying our sorrow,
Of the Mercy that grieves over sin,
Of the Hope that foretells that bright morrow
When God's flock shall be all gathered in.

Nicolai's serious determination of setting to work, on his return to Vienna, at his proposed opera, prolonged a stubborn illness. Tired of searching in vain the Spanish and Italian dramatists, and of his fruitless poetic labors that were the result, he fell back again on Shakespeare and his Merry Wives of Windsor, which had excited his musical sense of humor when he was in Italy. Fortune, from the outset, favored this notion of his, by enabling him at once to gain the services of that excellent author, H. S. Mosenthal, in carrying out his plan. Mosenthal undertook with zeal and skill the poetical part of the book, according to a scheme of the different pieces and scenes drawn up by the composer, and, also, the task of working out the intermediate dialogue. In introducing the latter, instead of the recitative usual at the Imperial Operahouse, Nicolai had in view a project of reform. Holding, as he did, and, as he once stated, by the way, in an article in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, to which we shall return in the course of our notice, that dialogue was indispensable to comic opera, he wanted to accustom the singers at the establishment in question, "who," as he once jokingly observed, "could only sing and not speak," to deliver it, for Vienna was the place where he intended, while he was composing it, that this German comic opera should be first produced. But fate, which only too often most capriciously plays at battledore and shuttlecock with men and their purposes, deranged the plan. The opera was not produced at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, until 1852, when its worth had been already recognized and appreciated everywhere else; nor was fate satisfied even with this, for what Nicolai wished to avoid was done: Die lustigen Weiber was given with the dialogues turned into musical recitatives by Proch.

But the mention of this re-modelling of the opera anticipates the proper succession of events in our sketch, though, when we go back to the latter part of the year 1844, we have only to repeat what is already known, namely, that Nicolai's direction was attended with the most beneficial result to the Opera and the newly-instituted Philharmonic Concerts. The latter, for the winter of 1844-45, began on the 27th October, 1844, with a performance of Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, and Beethoven's complete music to Egmont. But Nicolai's example exercised an animating effect, also, upon other musical societies, and thus was of advantage in promoting the musical feeling of the capital. For instance the Concerts Spirituels of the Association for Sacred Music awoke from a long period of drowsy indolence to new energy, as evidenced by Soirées prompted by better taste, by the distribution of prizes, etc. What more gratifying mark of their gratitude could the managers of these concerts offer him who indirectly urged them on, than by performing, in March, 1845, the sonorous Third Psalm, composed by Nicolai for contralto, when we bear in mind that the said concerts were especially devoted to Roman Catholic church music?

At this period, Nicolai, as a rule, devoted his attention, and love of composition, to sacred song, either because he was really preparing himself for the post in the Berlin Cathedral Choir, a post which the Intendant General, Count von Redern, acting on orders from the highest quarter, even now offered him in his letters, or because he again felt a liking for this branch of composition. So much is certain: he was already regarded in Berlin as the selected successor of Mendelssohn, a fact which induced the second conductor, E. Grell, to send in his resignation, and to give up his situation to S. W. Dehn, the celebrated musical scholar.

Profane musical lyrics, also, found a worshipper in Nicolai. He collected a number of lyrical effusions, some written during his first stay in Berlin, and others in Italy and Vienna, and gave them the form of twelve album-pages, which Mecheti published. Among these, we would direct attention to the songs set to words by Shakespeare; the deeply feeling song, in the popular style, "Der g'treue Bub," "Addio," and "Un Mot," both for two voices. Another number of four songs, from the 16th and 17th century, breathing the same pithy humor which pervades Die lustigen Weiber, was published, as Op. 35, by Schuberth, Hamburg. The beautiful song: "Waldwärts flog ein Vöglein," was so popular at this period, that it was to be heard everywhere; in the drawing-rooms of the nobility, at concerts, and in the rooms of simple members of the middle classes. In the summer of 1845, also, he set about composing a Symphony. It was first performed on the 30th November of the same year.

We might have mentioned sooner that, though, on account of his situation and musical tendencies, not without enemies,* Nicolai led at Vienna a very agreeable private life, associating with high families and select friends; for his taking qualities as an artist had rendered him very popular, so that, in all these respects, "beloved" Vienna must have become indispensable to, or, at least, not to be forgotten by him. It is true that other matters acted as a counterpoise to such an agreeable state of things, nay, they soon absolutely weighed it down, the consequence being that he ended by giving up, with a light heart, his apparently splendid position as a first Capellmeister, and accepted a seemingly subordinate post in Berlin. To these matters, which moved him deeply, and, on account of his continued indisposition, affected him more than they otherwise would have done, must be added, besides the defection from his interest of a friend of many years' standing, a serious difference with the Philharmonic Society, which he had established. Rendered arrogant by their rapid success, the members wanted to introduce into their statutes certain paragraphs which, in Nicolai's opinion, were derogatory to him as their director, and against which he felt bound to protest most emphatically. This dispute began not very promisingly the April of 1845, and even the peace brought about by other influences was but a sorry one, and could not rightly satisfy either party.

* At Königsberg, also, his mere appearance made enemies of Bümann, the Musical Director of the University, and Sobolewski, Conductor of the Singacademie.

Combined with these calamities was the manner in which the Royal Operahouse was managed, as we briefly explained elsewhere. This began to prove so oppressive to the German master, that he resolved to lay down his Capellmeister's stick, as far back as the 1st July, 1845. His resolution went the round of all the papers, and it was only on the pressing representations of certain high personages and of his own friends, that he temporarily abandoned it, in order to accept a new and more advantageous engagement up to April 1st, 1847. The reader must know that the Italian Opera, thanks to its really unrivalled resources, enjoyed well-merited patronage. Ballochino, the lessee of the German Opera, not being able to compete with it in the remotest degree as far as his vocalists were concerned, instead of trying to succeed by the excellence of his German repertory, endeavored to do so by producing in German all the operas which have proved hits during the Italian season, a course which served only to render more apparent the deficiency of his own establishment. This one-sided system was even extended so far that, for one whole year, there was not a single German novelty, but only four or five old masterpieces, the other operas being Italian ones translated into German. The want of vocalists was, for instance, made strikingly evident when, in 1845, Wild, an artist sixty years old, was engaged for thirty performances as first tenor. But it was not only Italian Opera which was thus favored. The officials, also, were selected in preference from Italians, and the theatre-lists of that period afford a perfectly model corroboration of this. Nicolai's position grew still more oppressive when Herr Pokorny, manager of the Theater an der Wien, supported by patronage from the highest quarter, and possessing energy and money, began to offer the public what they sought in vain at the Imperial Operahouse: admirable singers, with whom were associated the greatest celebrities in Europe, if only as "stars," and an excellent operatic repertory. The result of this happy system was that, during the German season, the attendance of the public at the Kärnthner Theater fell to a minimum, while that at the Theater an der Wien went up, till it reached an unexampled height, when the management, at an immense expense, succeeded in producing Vielka under Meyerbeer's own direction, and with Jenny Lind as the heroine. Nicolai felt very well what a most subordinate position he occupied, despite his dignity as Imperial Capellmeister, in the world of music, when opposed by such vigorous efforts, and, though he continued in his situation, all these circumstances, against which he struggled in vain, had a bad effect upon him, for he was already in an irritable state, which was manifested by continuous indisposition and a moroseness of manner that even estranged from him most of his friends. As a rule, he recovered his repose of mind in the open air, and, for this reason, he was fond of making trips in the neighborhood of Vienna, and holiday excursions, when he was certainly the happiest and most amiable of men. During one of these trips, in July, 1845, he visited the baths of Mehadia, in Hungary, and even entered Turkish territory near Belgrade.

This period was, by the bye, not favorable to Nicolai's efforts in the way of publishing, for, exclusive of the three Pianoforte Pieces, Op. 40, published by Diabelli in October, 1846, only two or three numbers of compositions of his appeared during his life-time. On the other hand, he devoted himself, it is true, to dramatic composition, above all to his Lustige Weiber, with the resolution and energy which distinguished him throughout the whole of his artistic career, and which were then only increased by unfavorable circumstances. "The industry," S. Kapper informs us, "with which he used to work at anything he had begun, was truly gigantic, nay, it might almost be termed killing. One piece after another was forwarded in the form of a first sketch to Mosenenthal, who resided, during the summer, in the country near Vienna, and was scarcely sent back before it was taken in hand. Little thought was given to rest and recreation. A grave malady, which threatened to destroy prematurely his by no means vigorous organism, was scarcely allowed to procure him a temporary pause. In return for this, however, the composer experienced the delight of seeing a work, into which he had thrown his whole heart and soul, created, as it were, in one piece."

But before this opera was completed, Il Tempelario, in Kapper's German version, already mentioned, was produced on the 20th December, 1845, as Der Tempelritter, but could not compete with Die Heimkehr des Verbannten, which was still a favorite opera with the public; nay, the fresh musical additions, resulting from the new tendencies of the composer, were generally regarded as disturbing the unity and character of the work. The critics praised the interesting and effective instrumentation, and the great skill displayed in the management of the vocal parts, but they dwelt, and not very indulgently either, on the absence of originality, as shown not only in imitation of melodies, but also in that of foreign forms.

This kind of success could not enable the opera to retain its place in the repertory, and to Nicolai's dissatisfaction at the really oppressive state of affairs already explained, was now added affronted vanity, a feeling that again impelled him to leave Vienna, and it was only the urgent representations made from high quarters which prevented his doing so at once.

But Nicolai felt very well that the existing circumstances impeded even the best intentioned efforts, and was firmly resolved to seize the first favorable opportunity for hastening to Berlin, where the post placed at his disposal by the Royal favor still beckoned to him and pointed to the Cathedral Choir, to which he had sent the Liturgy composed by him at the desire of the King for the whole Established Church of Prussia, and which is still regularly performed on Good Friday.

He continued to work diligently at Die lustigen Weiber; devoted the most zealous attention to the Philharmonic Concerts, and, moreover, undertook to direct provisionally the Concerts Spirituels, the success of which he aided most materially. But he was not to remain much longer. Rightly or wrongly, he considered himself not properly appreciated, and again tendered his resignation, which was at length accepted. On the 1st April, 1847, he retired from his post. After the negotiations with Conradin Kreutzer came to nothing, he was succeeded by Heinrich Esser, previously conductor of the Mayence "Liedertafel."

Nicolai at first made some short trips for the benefit of his health, but always returned to Vienna; it seemed as though he could not tear himself from the beautiful Imperial city. The post of director of the Conservatory was offered him; the state of his health, however, required absolute repose. In September, 1847, he went to Gräfenberg—and never beheld Vienna again.

Nicolai returned soon afterwards to Berlin, where the state of musical matters, contrary to that at Vienna in 1841, was highly satisfactory, a circumstance due more especially to the presence and efforts of Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer. The Royal Orchestra, the Opera, and the Cathedral Choir had become institutions of the first rank, requiring only a continuance of fostering care to extend their beneficial influence, aided, as they were, by the serious tendencies previously existing among the public. Nicolai contemplated with delight art-efforts which agreed so well with his own ideas, while to the invitations of his old Vienna friends, Th. Kullak, Kraus, Mme. Herrenburg, and others, was added once more an offer from the King for him to accept, as Mendelssohn's successor, the post of conductor of the Cathedral Choir, with the assurance of his future appointment as Capellmeister of the Royal Orchestra. All this induced him to fix his permanent professional residence in Berlin. Having previously demonstrated in Vienna his eminent talent for conducting bodies of instrumentalists, he was now attracted by the notion of being connected with a vocal choir, to which was to be given the closest similarity with the Sixtine Chapel at Rome, which he so enthusiastically admired. The opportunity was one enabling him to turn to account, as completely as successfully, the experience and knowledge he had gained in the Eternal City.

The very first important performance of the Cathedral Choir, under Nicolai's direction, on the 24th Sept., 1848, to consecrate the recently erected "Friedenskirche," at Sanssouci, when a new Liturgy and a Psalm by him were executed, perfectly satisfied the Royal personages and other high connoisseurs present. The consequence was that the King invited him to the Royal table, and expressed in the most flattering terms his appreciation of the performance.

Thus was Nicolai restored to Berlin and his native country. He devoted himself to the exigencies of his new position, as well as to the formation of singing-schools, with the zeal, punctuality, and scrupulous attention which actuated him in all he undertook. Considering that Berlin was not particularly distinguished in the matter of vocal instruction, and that there, as elsewhere, students were compelled to go abroad for lessons, it was a pardonable piece of self-esteem on his part to look upon himself as possessing a more decided vocation than any other singing-master, for but very few were as well acquainted as he was with the human voice and its capabilities. Besides this, he had, also, himself gone through a comprehensive course of vocal instruction.

Conducted by him, and following his principles, the Cathedral Choir soon made unexpected progress, while the amiability Nicolai displayed in the midst of all his artistic earnestness and energy, caused the reforms which he at once commenced to be received with readiness. Many of his then pupils in the Choir, still retain a pleasant recollection of the little light-haired man, nearly always in a good humor, who, most carefully dressed, and wearing the patent leather boots, with red shanks, of which he was particularly fond, sat cross-legged at the piano and gave his lessons.

The results the new and talented director obtained were, from the very outset, of the most surprising character, and confirmed so strongly the good feeling which the King had always evinced towards him, that, one day, when the fact of the Royal Orchestra being conducted by the Capellmeister Henning, then growing rather old, happened to be discussed, the King expressed a wish that Herr Henning should be pensioned, and that his post, also, should be conferred on the deserving Nicolai. The King's wish was, naturally, a command for his subject, and so, in December, 1847, it was announced to the members of the Royal Orchestra that, with the retirement of Henning at the commencement of the New Year, they would have to look upon Nicolai as their new chief.*

This was another of the short periods during which Nicolai felt quite comfortable and happy in his sphere of action. Nay, for some time previously, material life had asserted its claims. In obedience to them he sacrificed on the altar of mundane amusements, and went to a masked ball given on New Year's Eve at Mielentz's Rooms. He had never been indifferent to the daughters of Eve, especially to such as were handsome and well-formed, and he was soon upon the track of two pretty little creatures. The latter availed themselves to the utmost of the freedom they enjoyed by virtue of their masks, and, still more captivated, our domino was soon entangled in their nets. At last, he boldly joined the society of his two charmers, who had taken their seats next a male mask, to whom they appeared to belong. This individual, perceiving that there were no signs of Nicolai's discontinuing his attentions, enquired whom he had the honor of possessing for a neighbor. Nicolai, unmasking, replied: "The Royal Capellmeister Nicolai." "And I," answered his questioner, also unmasking, "am D., violoncellist in the Royal Orchestra."—"Maledetto!" exclaimed Nicolai, starting up in comic despair, "I call it rather hard for a man to compromise himself with his subordinate!" Of course the incident did not prevent the little party from spending the rest of the evening together very pleasantly.*

* According to his receipt books of the period, his monthly income amounted in consequence to 168 2-3 thalers. We must recollect, however, that this sum was materially diminished by the pensions regularly paid to his father, mother, and sister.

The new Capellmeister entered upon his additional duties for the first time at a Court Soirée, which he conducted, on the 27th January, 1848; and in which the celebrated Violoncellist Batta, as well as the incomparable Viardot Garcia also took part. The latter sang, with Mlle. Tuczeck, the first duet from Die lustigen Weiber. The King, who was excessively pleased with this admirable and characteristic composition, expressed a wish to see an opera by Nicolai at the Royal Operahouse; but the realization of this wish was deferred for some time, principally because the political storms of 1848, which threatened to undermine the throne itself, caused it to be forgotten.

At last, on the evening of the 12th March, when the audience was not what could be termed a very numerous one, for the minds of the multitude were already excited by revolutionary ideas, Nicolai took his position for the first time at the Conductor's desk of the Royal Operahouse, to conduct the performance of Spontini's Vestalin. All the papers expressed great satisfaction at his début, and even H. Kriger, the zealous admirer of Spontini, and a stern critic of the manner in which his works were represented, said in No. 3 of the Blätter für Musik, for 1848:

"The Capellmeister, Herr Nicolai, entered upon his new and difficult position, by conducting this opera (Die Vestalin) "and, up to the present time, we can speak only in terms of praise, of the care, energy, and penetration he has exhibited."

In the midst of the political tumult, Nicolai played merely the part of a spectator; he advocated progress achieved in conformity with the law. On the other hand, however, he was always active whenever it was requisite to introduce any change in the affairs and institutions of art. Unfortunately, death set a limit to his efforts; had he lived, his energy would have effected much which still remains to be done.

American Pianos.

The Piano Forte has kept steadily on in the march of improvement, hand in hand with time. It has grown from a very small box with very limited resources to a full grown instrument of great power, brilliancy and beauty. It has undergone no wonderful revolution in form, no radical change in principle, but the one has been added to and the other modified by experiment and experience.

The name of Chickering has been associated with the manufacture of Pianos for nearly fifty years. Jonas Chickering was one of the pioneers in the business, and his early success offered the first effectual check to the large importation of Piano Fortes from Europe. At that period, and for many years after, the demand for Pianos was very limited, so that as one after another manufacturer sprung up, following at a distance the lead of Chickering, it became possible to supply the home demand by home manufacture, and the public, at length believing in the sterling excellence of the American product, ceased to order from abroad, and the business of importing Pianos died out, it being impossible to pursue it with profit.

For upwards of forty years the house of Chickering & Sons has been the foremost house in America, its business doubling that of any other maker, and throughout the whole length and breadth of the country the name of "Chickering, Boston," was a talisman and a guaranty, which has penetrated into thousands of American homes, and was then as much a household word in proportion as it is this day, where its thirty thousand Pianos are forever vocalizing the simple words "Chickering, Boston."

To Chickering & Sons the modern Piano is indebted for its most important improvements. The entire iron frame was first used by Chickering and Sons, and was exhibited by them at the first great International Exhibition in London, where it created a profound excitement, receiving the first medal ever awarded to an American Piano Forte manufacturer, and the approval of all the eminent makers of Europe who afterwards adopted the principle; thus giving use to the expression "manufactured after the American plan."

Chickering and Sons first introduced the "circular scale," from which springs all the present excellence of the American piano. The adoption of this scale, which the Chickering's generously left unpatented for the benefit of the whole trade, has given to the piano depth, power, and beauty of quality of tone; in short, it has opened the way for the splendid qualities which distinguish the piano of to-day from the piano of fifteen years ago.

The immense business done by Chickering & Sons necessitated manufacturing facilities in proportion, and led to the erection of their model extensive and splendid manufactory in Boston, which is the largest in the world, and has been imitated on a smaller scale by other manufacturers in this country; although much of their wonderful labor-saving machinery, the invention of the Chickering's themselves, cannot be imitated, and is therefore not to be found elsewhere.

The Piano Forte Manufactory of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, Boston, is unquestionably the most perfect and extensive piano manufactory in the world. Considered in this light alone, it is an object of attraction, ornament and pride for our country; but its general interest is doubly heightened by the reflection that its magnitude indicates the rapidly-increasing culture of the "divine art" in this country.

The gigantic structure was put under contract May 16th, 1853. The premises comprise an entire square of 206,000 feet, or about five acres, situated on the westerly side of Tremont, between Camden and Northampton streets.

The whole of this grand building is devoted exclusively to the manufacture of Pianos, and all the interior arrangements for the business are on a scale to correspond with what has already been described. The rough stock is taken in at the lower door, in one wing, and passing up this wing, through the main building, and down the other wing, is delivered in the warehouses finished—so that, almost literally, "forests enter at one end of the building, and come out perfectly pianos at the other."

Formerly great European pianists who visited this country brought their special favorite instruments with them, not supposing that they could be supplied with a fitting instrument here. Now the European reputation of the Chickering Grand Pianos is so widely established by the concurrent opinions of Thalberg, De Meyer, Strakosch, Wallace, Benedict, Goldschmidt, Gottschalk, Hoffman, Wehli, and other artists, and by the great English, French, German and Italian testimonials (continually being received from the most celebrated pianists and piano manufacturers of Europe), that the Chickering Grands are now used in their concerts in America, by nearly all of the distinguished artists of the Piano who visit us.

All the Chickering Pianos have a characteristic tone which distinguishes them from all others. It is delicate and refined, and may be described as a perfection of quality as distinguished from quantity, or coarse loudness. The uncultivated ear is at once attracted by a big tone. In music, as in literature, the uneducated generally prefer sound to sense; but this big tone, though very attractive at first, speedily becomes wiry and harsh, because in the beginning it was deficient in quality, and its freshness once gone, it has nothing left but noise: while the tone which is based upon the purity of quality improves for several years, then remains stationary, and never wholly deteriorates, as can be shown by instruments still extant manufactured by Jonas Chickering forty years ago.

The house of Chickering & Sons fully maintains its supremacy. Their manufactory is still much the largest in the world; the number of pianos they turn out weekly in Grands, Squares, and Uprights exceeds that of any single manufacturer in America. Their Pianos, when brought into close competition with those of any other maker, have always been pronounced superior, and their Grand Piano, which is the instrument which stamps the supreme reputation of a manufacturer, is always (?) chosen by the world's acknowledged great pianists as the only (?) instrument on which they can reveal in the highest degree their skill, imagination and sentiments, and is consequently the leading Concert Piano in America.

Worcester County Musical Convention.

It closed on Friday evening, and was, in every respect the most successful convention of the kind ever held in this portion of the State. Our columns have testified to the liberality of the arrangements, and to the disposition of the managers to bring into service the best available talent. It was agreed that this year's Convention should, in a measure, prepare the way for a future Festival; so Carl Zerrahn was engaged as conductor of the oratorio-music to be studied and performed, and talented vocalists and performers, the best that could be obtained, were announced and appeared without fail. It was daily found worthy of remark that invariably the Convention gave more than it promised, rather showing an embarrassment of riches than the want of them.

Monday and Tuesday were chiefly occupied with exercises in the rudiments of singing; in the practice of what New Englanders have grown to call "church-music;" this portion of the exercises conducted by Solon Wilder; and in vigorous rehearsals of choruses in Judas Maccabæus, which had been selected for performance on the concluding and oratorio night. Wednesday evening brought the first concert, with a well chosen miscellaneous programme. Mr. Geo. E. Whiting played a March, by Meyerbeer, and other selections for the Organ, showing unusual skill in pedal-playing, and in the management of orchestral effects. Miss Fanny Riddell sang several operatic selections with a good degree of skill, and commendable vivacity and animation; and Mrs. Munroe of this city, gave pleasure, as she always does, by her rare qualities of voice, (contralto,) and her conscientious rendering of the music she sings. Mr. J. Whitney, of Boston, sang a song by Abt; and another by Baker. His voice—a tenor of fine quality; his selections and happy manner of rendering them, won him a hearty reception. Dr. Guilmette sang Russell's "Ship on Fire," and the Prayer from "St. Paul" each performance being excellent in its way, the latter especially fine.

On Thursday morning Dr. Guilmette delivered an interesting and valuable lecture on the formation, cultivation, and preservation of the voice. Holding the theory that voice is breath made vocal, he believed that the more breath the singer has, the more voice. His remarks were alike suited to speakers and vocalists, and included a full description of the respiratory organs, the importance of frequently inflating the lungs with air, strengthening alike the voice and the chest, training the singer and attending to muscular development. He cautioned all against "throaty tones," which are unpleasant in speaking as well as singing, and illustrated by some fine specimens of elocution, the difference between them and those produced from the chest. During the lecture hour Master Brear sang "The Skylark," and "With Verdure Clad." His fresh boy-soprano, and his juvenile appearance, as well as the skill and taste shown in his singing, awakened much enthusiasm. His instructor, Mr. Henry Carter, of Boston, was present, and gave a masterly organ-performance of a fugue in C minor, by Krebs. In the evening the second concert was given, under the direction of Mr. Wilder. The full chorus, we know not how many hundred voices, sang a chorus by Neukomm, another with fugue by Novello, hymn-tunes, &c.: the Salem St. church choir sang a fine quartet—a melody by Pachor, harmonized and arranged by Mr. C. C. Stearns; Messrs. C. Henshaw Smith, G. W. Sumner, and G. A. Adams played selections from Chopin; Mr. Richards sang the great air from "St. Paul," "Be thou faithful unto death;" Mrs. E. A. Allen gave an artistic and soulful interpretation of a scena and aria from "Der Freyschütz;" and Mrs. Doane's singing of Gagliardi's "Gratias Agimus Tibi," was most praiseworthy. Other performers were well worthy of mention, but we can only name a new singer, Miss Granger, who has marked talent, and a pure, sweet voice, which gave evidence of good cultivation. As on the previous evening, the piano-accompaniments were played by Mr. B. D. Allen.

Friday, the concluding day, was in every respect the most interesting in promise and performance, and well worthy to bring the seasons of the Convention to a happy close. In the afternoon of each day, a "social-hour," so-called, had been set apart, in which were heard such performances as were volunteered by members of the class. There was much that was really excellent in many of these; and as a whole, they rank much above the standard of such things in previous years. On Friday afternoon its place was supplied by a concert given by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, which was an occasion to be long and pleasantly remembered. The Club, assisted by Herr Stein, played their best, and there was excellent singing by Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mr. Whitney, and Dr. Guilmette. In the evening the Hall was filled in every portion, and the oratorio of Judas Maccabæus was performed, in a manner highly creditable to Conductor Zerrahn and the singers with whom he was trying in four or five days to do the work of as many months. Mr. Whiting was organist on the occasion; and the Quintette Club, aided by Stein, contra-basso, lent valuable assistance as orchestra. The choruses were, as a whole, exceedingly well sung. Particularly well given were such inspiring ones as "We come in bright array," "Hear us," "Fallen is the foe," "Tune your harps," and "See, the conquering Hero comes." For a Convention performance some of these choruses were remarkably well sung. Mr. Whitney's singing of the part of Judas was very effective, especially in those strong points which have taxed the powers of the greatest singers. Mrs. H. M. Smith sang the piano airs with rare taste and expression, adhering firmly to the text and the ideas of the composer, stooping to no trickery to gain applause; in a word, giving herself wholly to the best possible interpretation of the music. Her singing was highly satisfactory. Dr. Guilmette sang the bass solos in a manner that was good to hear. In both recitatives and airs, every word was distinctly heard in the most distant corner of the Hall, and even in the room below. The remaining solos, &c., were sustained by Mrs. Allen, Mrs. Munroe, Miss Stone, and Messrs. Richards and Hammond of this city. Of their performances we have not room to speak, but they were generally well received.

With the close of the musical festivities of the week, it was felt that much had been gained in this Convention over those of past years. In engaging the most talented performers for their concerts, &c., the managers ran some pecuniary risk which they have now no reason to regret. The public has more than sustained them, and another year will doubtless warrant still further attempts to make the occasion some time a strictly Musical Festival rather than a Convention.—Palladium, Oct. 31.

The Kahlenberg.—Mozart.

In the neighborhood of Vienna, overlooking the City, the Danube, and the vast plain towards Styria, rises a small chain of hills, on the summit of which formerly stood a large convent. Murray's "Handbook to Southern Germany" gives an excellent description of the locality; and as no visitor to the imperial capital of Austria should omit to explore the heights and recesses of those wooded mountains, both historically and musically interesting, I will here insert an extract from the above work.

"The Leopoldsberg, 824 feet high, is the last eminence of the chain of the Wiener Wald. On a projecting ledge, about half way up the hill, a wooden summer-house, called the Belvedere, has been erected, overhanging the river. It commands a very fine and most extensive view. Vienna is seen to a great advantage. The majestic spire of St. Stephen's, rising against the sky, is a beautiful object; but the striking feature of the view is the Danube, the monarch of European rivers, which even here is larger than any in Britain, and rolls its rapid and mighty stream at your feet, hurrying along vast floats of wood and heavily laden barges on its broad bosom. A little below Nußdorf it is split into various small streams by a number of wooded islands, and is crossed by the wooden bridges over which runs the high road from Vienna to Prague.

"Looking up the stream, the town and monastery of Kloster Neuberg are seen to advantage; and nearer, on the opposite side of the river, is the hill of Bisamberg, which produces one of the best Austrian wines. The Leopoldsberg receives its name from the Austrian Markgrave, who built a castle on its summit, which has now disappeared. A small church and rude tavern occupy its site.

"Those who desire a continuation of the same prospect may ascend the loftier top of the adjoining Kahlenberg.

"The inhabitants of Vienna repair in flocks to the Kahlenberg on Sundays, and ascend its heights in order to enjoy the prospect and fresh air. The building on the summit was originally a convent, founded by Ferdinand II., suppressed by Joseph II., afterwards a summer residence of the Prince de Ligne, who died and is buried here. Mozart composed part of the Zauberflöte in this inn (Casino)."

In a small room at one end of this casino, situated on the verge of the mountain, Mozart, four months previous to his death, resided for a short time in hopes of recruiting his strength; and in this modest, rural retreat he is said to have composed the memorable overture and the priests' march of "Zauberflöte." The visit to this casino, in 1845, I have always remembered, as one of the most interesting of my musical rambles on the continent. In company with my late countryman and brother artist, Paris Alvars, the celebrated harpist, I ascended the Kahlenberg, and as we rode through the vineyards, we could perceive groups of happy, merry citizens, threading their way through the winding footpaths, taking advantage of the lovely day to enjoy a "pic-nic," and the charming scenery. Immediately on our arrival at the summit of the mountain, we hastened to the room once occupied by Mozart, and on the door of which had been carved in large letters, "Das Zimmer des Virtuosen Mozart." The day previous to our visit, a young musical student had made his pilgrimage to this "sacred spot," and defaced the word "Virtuosen." When remonstrated with, for such an act of wanton mischief, the fanatical youth excused himself by saying that it was a downright insult to call Mozart "virtuosen," more especially to write it on the door of an apartment in which was produced an overture that had immortalized him as a composer! With this explanation, the youth escaped punishment.

Alvars enjoyed the anecdote vastly, and to the great astonishment of mine host applauded the discriminating taste of the financier, telling him at the same time that the erosion of the word virtuosen would rather tend to increase than diminish the number of musical pilgrims to the casino. Mine host, like the late proprietor of Shakespeare's birth-place, cared little for the immediate object of musical visitors to this hallowed temple of the muse, and was quite satisfied with the prospect of increased consumption of viands and other cheer that enriched his store of wealth. The Italian word "virtuoso," in English literature, is used to signify "a lover of the liberal arts;" the precise signification of it, as used among German musicians, implies "an exponent of ability." The terms applied to musicians by the Germans are various.—Tondichter (the poet of sounds) was the appellation given to Beethoven, instead of the ordinary name "Tonkünstler" (the scientific musician). The creative faculty in art should ever command the greatest honors, however gifted may be the executive powers of a player on any instrument. When the English admirers of Kean insisted on a public funeral in St. Paul's for this tragedian, the Times, in one of its usual powerful articles, significantly pointed to the modest niche in Poet's Corner to the memory of him whose genius created actors! Posterity had crowned the memory of poor Mozart by a just appreciation of his genius, and although his grave remained for years a neglected spot, by the individual exertions of Mme. Hasselt-Barthe, the prima donna of the court theatre, a suitable monument is now placed over his remains. This latent homage to Mozart, and the above incident, are proofs of the idol-worship inspired by the creative genius of this composer among those best qualified to appreciate his works, and I never listen to that chef d'œuvre, the overture to the "Zauberflöte," without calling to mind the mingled emotions I experienced on visiting "Das Zimmer des Virtuosen Mozart" on the Kahlenberg.—Orchestra.

LEIPZIG. The beginning of the Gewandhaus concerts was postponed, on account of the cholera, to Oct. 18. The examination of new pupils for the Conservatorium was also postponed from the 4th to the 15th of Oct., on which day the new course began.—Röntgen, a distinguished member of the Gewandhaus orchestra and of David's Quartet, has been honored by a call to St. Petersburg, to become concert-master to the Russian Musical Society and professor in the musical Conservatoire there.—The second debut of the young Theodore Wachtel, in the part of Lionel in Martha, was not less brilliant than the first. His father was present.

The Euterpe society, under the direction of Herr von Bernuth, will give ten subscription concerts, eight of them orchestral, and two of chamber music. They will be in the hall of the Booksellers' Exchange, except those with chorus, which will be in the Centralhalle. Among the choral works to be given are: Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice;" the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven; the "Walpurgis Night" of Mendelssohn; an act from Cherubini's "Anacreon;" Schumann's "Manfred" music; and Handel's "Belshazzar."

We find the following list of operas performed in Leipzig in the months of August and September: Halevy's L'Eclair; "Barber of Seville;" Freyshütz; Czar und Zimmermann; Mehul's "Joseph;" Marschner's Hans Heiling; Gounod's Faust; Flotow's Martha and Sirindella; Robert le Diable; Musamello; Zauberflöte; Offenbach's "Orpheus in Hell;" Flotte Bursche, by Suppé. In all, 14 operas in 24 performances.

The "Andante-Allegro," a club of artists and friends of art, on the 13th of October celebrated the seventy-fourth birthday of Prof. Moritz Hauptmann, who has so long worthily held old Bach's place of Cantor to the Thomas-Schule.

BERLIN. Niemann made his debut in Tannhäuser, with the greatest success.—Mlle. Ariët is re-engaged for three months.—Offenbach's Les Burvards has been successfully played at the Friedrich-Wilhelm theatre. Roger, the French tenor, has given 38 successful representations of Lucia, La Favorita, La Dame Blanche, Jeun de Paris, Fra Diavolo and Zampa, and the king, returning from Sadowa, has decorated him; he goes next to Stettin, Lubek, Königsberg, St. Petersburg, &c., and will only return to Paris on the eve of the Exposition Universelle, when all the great artists will flock thither.

The Singacademie will produce this winter: Ferdinand Hiller's "Destruction of Jerusalem," Handel's "Samson," and the Missa Solennis (sixteen-part Mass) by its director, Grell.—Carl Tausig, a pianist of the Liszt school, with other birds of the same feather (Franz Bendel, &c.), has established a Pianoforte Institute in Berlin. Tausig is styled court-pianist to the king of Prussia, as Bülow was before he followed Wagner to Munich.

MUNICH.—Mozart's "Don Juan" is to be revived very shortly, with numerous ameliorations in its mode of representation. The original recitatives and several numbers hitherto omitted will be restored. The scenery and dresses, also, will be new. Another novelty will be "Der Wunderthätige Magus" ("El Magico Prodigioso") of Calderon, with music by Rheinberger, which has been in preparation for some time past.

VIENNA.—The Philharmonic Society is preparing, among other things, for the coming season, the Faust of Berlioz, Gade's Cantata: "The Crusaders," and Bach's great Mass in B minor,—works never heard before in Vienna. For solo artists the Society has engaged Joachim and the pianist Augusta Kolar.—Hellmesberger, director of the Conservatorium, resumes his Quartet soirées on the 15th inst., with the aid of the two lady pianists Mario Krebs and Augusta Kolar.

Besides the above, we find further details of the riches offered by the "Gesellschaft" and the "Philharmonic" concerts. The programmes of the two contain also: Overture to the "Rhine-wine Lied," by Schumann (new;) to the Berggeist, by Spohr; and to Abu Hassan, by Weber; Beethoven's 7th Symphony and Choral Fantasia; a Symphony by Schubert in B minor; the entire music of Mendelssohn's Athalie, and the Loreley finale. Other novelties will be: Suites, by Lachner and Raff; Symphonies, by Ferd. Hiller and Bargiel. Of well-known orchestral works the Philharmonic will perform: Beethoven's 6th, 8th and 9th Symphonies; Schumann's Second Symphony, and "Overture, Scherzo and Finale;" Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; Beethoven's Egmont music, &c.

Paris.

GLUCK'S "ALCESTE." A correspondent of the London Orchestra writes (Oct. 16):

Gluck's "Alceste" was re-produced on Friday last at the Grand Opera. It would be useless for me to give you an account of the piece; for the history of that model wife (Alceste), who willingly sacrificed herself to save her husband's life, and was only rescued from Hades by the interposition of Hercules, who told Pluto that he "could not stand that," is fresh in the minds of all your readers. This work, originally composed for the Viennese stage, the poet being Calzabigi, was produced in 1776, and was afterwards re-arranged for the French Opera in 1776. Gluck had at that time already secured a certain reputation in our capital: "Iphigénie en Aulide," words by Le Bailly du Rollet (1774), and "Orphée et Eurydice," arranged from the Italian of Calzabigi (Vienna, 1762,) by the same, had produced a great effect. Two violent parties for whom music had no charms to soothe the savage breast were formed; the Gluckists and the Piccinists belabored each other, and not always in print, in a most praiseworthy and conscientious manner. The latter got Piccini to Paris (1777) and placed him in the lists to compose a Roland, on which subject Gluck was engaged, but refused to continue as soon as he heard of the proposed concours, and so the strife between the two parties lasted until 1780, when Gluck retired to Vienna, and the public discovered that it was better to admire the beauties contained in an opera than to quarrel about the exact amount of comparative merit that it might or might not possess.

Before this period Gluck had composed many operas. After a long stay in Milan we find him in London (1746), where his opera "La Caduta dei Giganti" (The Fall of the Giants) was produced. This was far from being a success, and Handel "cut it up" relentlessly. A pasticcio of airs from his best operas, arranged and presented by himself under the title of "Pyramus and Thisbe," was scarcely more fortunate, but had the effect of producing a great change in his future "manner." While listening to the first performance he was astonished to find that the numbers which had received the greatest applause in the operas for which they were originally composed were of no avail the moment the words and actions were changed. He came to the conclusion that there was something more in music than the art of pleasing the ear, and that every piece properly composed had a real expression in perfect analogy to the sentiment or passion it was intended to represent. This was the turning-point in Gluck's career, and the effect of his meditations is sufficiently apparent in the "Semiramide" he wrote to Metastasio's words in 1748 (Vienna).

I have no need to follow his career from that time; the subject has been lately treated in your columns by a far more able writer than a flâneur like myself; so I return to "Alceste," the best of the two operas, to which he has prefixed a "Dedictory Epistle." Without transcribing it at length, there are one or two passages that the composers of this Thérésian and Offenbachish age will do well to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest. He says: "I have sought to apply music to its proper purpose: that is, to strengthen the expression of the sentiment of the piece and the interest of the situation. I have always been careful to allow an artist to have the full play of his powers in an exciting moment, without causing him to stop short for the sake of introducing an uninteresting ritournelle, or to mark a pause on a certain note to allow him to make a point d'orgue to show the quality of his voice to the detriment of the dramatic situation." And so on. A quiet meditation of the whole would be useful to some of our modern geni.

The rehearsals of "Alceste" were nearly the first to which the aristocracy were admitted in France. Gluck was in the habit of half undressing himself and doffing a night-cap before the commencement; and when the rehearsal was over, the greatest men in the land disputed the honor of presenting him his surcoat, wig, &c. Notwithstanding the opposition of the true and uncompromising Italian school, the opera was more than an ordinary success. Alceste was played by Mlle. Levasseur; the names of the other interpreters escaped me. I took a note of them the other day on a piece of red cardboard, and handed it over unwittingly as a correspondence to the conductor of an omnibus. The French were already blagueurs, even at that time. The Abbé Arnaud, a furious Gluckist, said on leaving the theatre at the end of the first performance: "Gluck has restored la douleur antique." "Yes," answered a Piccinist enragé, "I would rather he had given us le plaisir moderne." Another night a malcontent said to him: "You see that Alceste has fallen." "Fallen from Heaven" said the Abbé: and as many more as you like, ejusdem farinae, which you may find in any French "Joe Miller," or "Délices des Réunions de Famille," at twenty-five centimes on the Quays.

Let us take a violent jump over nearly a hundred years, and we can assist at a reprise of "Alceste" in 1861 at the Grand Opera. The cast contains the names of Mme. Viardot (Alceste), MM. Michot (Admète) and Cazaux (Le Grand Prêtre). Notwithstanding Mme. Viardot's immense talent she failed to produce an effect. The entire part had to be transposed to suit her exceptional voice; some of the pieces being sung as much as a fourth lower. Her only real success was in the air "Divinités du Styx." M. Michot was unequal and ineffective as Admète, and M. Cazaux a "waverer" between High and Low in the part of the High Priest. Another five year's leap brings us to the performance of the other night, infinitely superior to the last revival. Mlle. Marie Battu (Alceste) fairly astonished the audience with her splendid reading of the part. She understands the character of the resigned and devoted wife to perfection; she never cants, and though she may want a little of the "heavy" energy which Mme. Viardot threw into certain portions of the role, take her for all in all, we shall not find such a distinguished and sympathetic artist to sustain so difficult a part for a long time to come. Both acting and singing were perfect; and it was really pleasant to hear a real cantatrice "bring down the house" by sheer art, and without being forced to have recourse to those awful vocal outbursts which are generally considered as being indispensable by the votaries of the "go in and win" system. M. Villaret, who never endangered his life, even in the Suivez moi of "Guillaume Tell," for he possesses a C "natural" in every respect, was a great improvement on his predecessor, and sang the part of Admète, in a very praiseworthy manner. M. David deserves honorable mention for his rendering of the High Priest. The minor parts were well sustained, only M. Grisy, who represents Apollo, reminded me rather too much of Mr. Tupman, and would do well to follow a course à la Banting.

Apocryph of the Italian, there has been nothing new this week, Mlle. Patti and Lagrass, have both been influenced by the state of the weather. M. Agnési, the best basso of the troupe, is "lent" to the manager of Madrid for a short time for the cast of "Semiramide," in which he is to play Assur.

I quote the following from the Almanach de la Musique, which gives the salaries of the principal artists of the Opera: merely observing that MM. Naudin and Dumestre have taken their leave:—MM. Naudin, 110,000 fr.; Faure, 90,000 fr.; Gueymard, 72,000 fr.; Villaret, 45,000 fr.; Morère, 40,000 fr.; Obin, 38,000 fr.; Belval, 38,000 fr.; Dumestre, 36,090 fr.; Warot, 32,000 fr.; Mmes. Gueymard, 60,000 fr.; Sass, 60,000 fr.; Battu, 60,000 fr.; Salvioni, 30,000 fr.; Fioretti, 24,000 fr. Total: 635,000 francs; and yet I hear the whole troupe singing, with tears in their eyes, "On ne paie qu'en Angleterre!"

Another correspondent writes: The reprise of Gluck's Alceste at the Académie Impériale de Musique, which took place on Friday last, is the talk of all Paris. The qualities of the old master are freely discussed in all musical circles; the merits of the work are canvassed with more than ordinary pertinacity; and the performance is criticised with unexpected lenity. The French in general, the Parisians in particular, entertain an unusual respect for mediocre talent. Acting upon this conviction, the managers here do not think themselves bound, in the production of great works, to provide, for their interpretation, great artists. When great artists can be procured I have no doubt that inferior artists would not be substituted. When Alceste was revived at the Grand Opéra, in 1861, Madame Viardot was expressly engaged to play the part of the heroine, and that, dramatically speaking, no living singer could sustain the part with more force and grandeur was demonstrated in the performance. The music, nevertheless, being written for a high soprano, rendered the transposition of several of the airs imperative, and these, however skillfully contrived by M. Hector Berlioz—who superintended the getting up of the opera—were found to lose much of their effect and character by the lowering process. Having decided on the production of Alceste—led thereto by the enormous success achieved by the same composer's Orphée at the Théâtre-Lyrique, when it almost reached its 200th representation—M. Emile Perrin, not having Madame Viardot at hand, or one equal to Madame Viardot, decided upon casting his favorite prima donna, Mlle. Marie Battu, for Alceste, although well aware that charming young lady and brilliant songstress was entirely unsuited to the music, or to the dramatic exigencies of the character, in its grandeur, passion, and sublimity of devotion. Who could blame M. Emile Perrin under the circumstances. It might have been urged, indeed, that the manager was not compelled to bring out Alceste at a certain time, and that he might have waited for a more favorable opportunity. I learn from a reliable source that M. Perrin was blinded by Mlle. Marie Battu's success in Motse, in which it cannot be denied that she sang the music of Anaïs in first-rate style, and acted most becomingly. But Rossini's flowing and love-melting strains are very different from the broad, sustained and simple melodies of the old German master; and, compared with Alceste, Rossini's heroine shines with but a pale lustre. Mlle. Marie Battu, indeed, has undeniable talent, but lacks loftiness of expression and declamatory power; while her pronunciation is ill fitted for the forcible and pointed delivery of the words which Euripides has put into the mouth of the self-sacrificing Greek wife.

The critical public find fault with M. Perrin for not producing Armide, or Les Deux Iphigénie, in place of Alceste; but M. Hector Berlioz, I have no doubt, had good reasons for recommending the last-named work. Under the superintendence of M. Berlioz, Alceste has received every care and consideration in its performance at the Academy.

The revival had a great success, judging from the bravos and the recalls; but, to my thinking, Alceste will not go down with the public. Were Mlle. Tietjens to sing the part of the heroine it would require no particular gift of vaticination to proclaim a different fate for Gluck's opera at the Académie Impériale de Musique et de Dance.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The winter concerts were inaugurated on Saturday, (Oct. 6) when, the day being fine, nearly six thousand persons assembled to welcome back to the concert-room Mr. Manns and his admirable instrumental force. Mr. Manns made a magnificent commencement with Mendelssohn's overture to Ruy Blas, which was executed with astonishing vigor and precision. Beethoven's symphony in B flat (No. 4) was another splendid performance, every movement being listened to with intensest interest, and the applause at the end being loud and prolonged. Herr Fritz Hartvigson, the Copenhagen pianist, played a fantasia by Schubert with good effect.

The vocal music was entrusted to Mlle. Elvira Behrens and Mlle. Enequist. The last-named lady sang the romance of Matilda, "Sombre forêt," from Guillaume Tell, and Violetta's aria, "Ah! fors'è lui" from the Traviata; the former, Schumann's "Schön Blümlein," Mendelssohn's "Maiglöckchen," and Gounod's "Serenade." Both ladies had no cause to complain of want of encouragement on the part of the audience.

ALFRED MELLON'S CONCERTS. The special night of the week, as usual, was the classical night, Thursday, devoted to Haydn and Weber. To Haydn were assigned two pieces, and Weber had all the rest. The two pieces of Haydn, however, were not given, as Mr. Leigh Wilson, set down for "In native worth," from the Creation, being indisposed, another tenor was obviously necessitated, who, not desirous to exhibit his talent in its "native worth," chose instead Himmel's song of "Yarico to her lover." This was Mr. Alfred Hemming, who, truth to say, sang Himmel's lovely wail so well and expressively as to make the audience call him back to the platform. Haydn's other suppliance was the melodious and well-known Symphony in G, letter Q, played to perfection—absolute perfection, to make use of a current pleonasm. Weber's share of the programme comprised—Overture to Preciosa; Adagio and Rondo from clarinet concerto, Mr. Lazarus, solo instrumentalist; song, "Araby, O Araby" from Oberon, sung by Mlle. Georgi; Andante and Finale from Trio in G minor, for pianoforte, flute, and violoncello, played by Mlle. Krebs, Mr. R. S. Pratten, and Mr. G. Collins; and Sir Huon's song from Oberon, "O 'tis a glorious sight to see."—Mus. World, Oct. 13.

Oct. 20. Mendelssohn and Mr. Alfred Mellon had the worst possible weather for the "classical night," on Thursday. The selection included—overture to The Isles of Fingal; aria, "If with all your hearts," from Elijah, sung by Mr. Alfred Hemming; Concerto for pianoforte, in G minor, played by Mlle. Krebs; Overture in C, for wind instruments (Op. 24); vocal duet, "Hassan and Zuloka," given by Miss Emily Lonsdale and Mr. Alfred Hemming; and Overture and incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. The three overtures—so varied in their styles, and all three so powerfully dramatic and so picturesquely treated—were executed with splendid effect, the marvellous prelude to Shakespeare's poem coming in for the loudest applause. Indeed, the incidental music created quite as great a sensation as the overture, and the trio for two bassoons and oboe was rapturously encored. Mlle. Marie Krebs had a warm reception, and a universal recall after her brilliant performance of the famous G minor concerto. Why the Mendelssohn programme should be followed in the first part by the grand selection from Rossini's Mosè in Egitto we cannot say. The composer of the music to A Midsummer Night's Dream was worthy of an entire part to himself. The second part opened with a new selection from M. Gounod's Faust, embracing the principal features of the opera, arranged for his own concerts by Mr. Alfred Mellon, in which the orchestra was strengthened by the band of the Coldstream Guards, under the direction of Mr. Fred. Godfrey. Signor Bottesini played his own fantasia on the contra-basso, "Carneval de Venise"—with what effect we need not say; and Mlle. Carlotta Patti sang Signor Tito Mattei's "Waltzer," and Signor Traversi's "Tarantelle," and, being encored in the former, substituted Mr. Mellon's ballad, "Cupid's Eyes." The orchestra played the new waltz, "Lemuel," and Mr. Fred Godfrey's "United Service" quadrilles, in the latter being joined by the band of the Coldstream Guards.

A series of ballad concerts has been announced to commence on Monday.

NORWICH FESTIVAL. The arrangements for the Norwich Musical Festival, which will commence on the 29th inst., are being rapidly matured, rehearsals now taking place frequently in St. Andrew's Hall. On Monday evening (Oct. 29), the Festival will commence with the National Anthem (solos by the principal singers), followed by Israel in Egypt. On Tuesday evening, a miscellaneous concert. On Wednesday morning, an anthem by Spohr, and Costa's Naaman, (conducted by the composer). On Wednesday evening, a second miscellaneous concert, in which the chief feature will be The Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelssohn). On Thursday morning, St. Cecilia, written expressly for the Festival by Mr. Benedict; a selection from Handel's Passion Music; and the first and second parts of The Creation. On Thursday evening, another miscellaneous concert; and on Friday morning (as usual), The Messiah. The principal vocal performers are Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Rudersdorf, Miss Edith Wynne, Mlle. Sinico, Mme. Demerle-Lablache, Mlle. Anna Draadil, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Signor Morini, Mr. Santley, Mr. Weiss, and M. Gassier. Mr. Benedict will once more act as general conductor.

Concerning the libretto of "The Legend of St. Cecilia," to be produced at the Norwich Festival next month, its author (Mr. Chorley) observes:—"It has long been a favorite fancy of mine to treat the Legend of Saint Cecilia for music with a view to the possible revival of such celebrations as were held in gone-by years, when English sympathy for the Art was more limited in every respect than at the present time. It is true that the names of Dryden and Addison among the poets, and of Handel among the musicians, who have made "divine Cecilia's" praise immortal, might be thought to deter any one from dealing with the subject.—But theirs were merely votive odes indirectly bearing on the power of the Art, of which Cecilia is patron Saint.—This Cantata of mine sets forth her story, which, so far as I am aware, has not been done before in any of the works produced for the Cecilian Festivals in England. All who are familiar with the accepted legend, as told in the "Legenda Aurea" of Jacobus Jannensis, Archbishop of Genoa, will perceive that I have treated it with a certain liberty. Some of the minor incidents—such as the conversion and martyrdom of Tiburtius, the brother of Valerianus—have been omitted with a view of avoiding the introduction of secondary persons, and of concentrating the main interest in the martyr heroine. Further, the catastrophe which (to cite Dryden's known line in defiance of its original import) has been simplified. The legend narrates that after the agony of slow fire, which failed to kill the Christian bride, the sword ended her days. A literal adherence to this tradition might have weakened the closing scene by presenting two situations of the same character. Others must judge how far I have been indiscreet, or the reverse, in its omission." The work—set, as is well known, by Benedict—contains thirteen numbers.

Ristori.

The past two weeks have given us no great music; yet they have been rich with an artistic experience very nearly akin to music, namely great tragic acting, by a true woman, of noble presence and decided genius, with a most musical and perfect voice, and in that most musical Italian tongue, which it is an artistic luxury to sit and listen to, although one scarcely understands it,—the mere power of tones, the natural language (looks and gestures), the great, true acting in short, making all intelligible to us as music does without words, or with words which we only heed as vehicles of tones. Ristori is indeed a great actress; if any doubted it at first, they have become convinced by seeing her in several characters. Medea, Schiller's Mary Stuart, Queen Elizabeth—her own creation of the historic character, in spite of the poor work of a play-wright—Judith, the inspired heroine, the Jeanne d'Arc of the Apocrypha, the fearful Phædra of the Greek fate tragedy, and Lady Macbeth,—the first real, Shakspeare's, Lady Macbeth that we have ever yet seen on our stage,—have afforded abundant opportunity to satisfy oneself whether her acting were great.

We have seen her in all of these except the first, Medea. We felt them all as characters, essentially distinct and individual, each consistently developed from a central principle of character or ruling passion, each having a unity under progressive various manifestations. So to conceive, so to present a wide variety of characters implies not only insight, thoughtful analysis, and clever combining faculty, it implies imagination. Her acting is called very real; it is even disparaged sometimes by the term realistic. So it is real; and does it not require imagination to realize character, situations, destiny? Is not this the very essence of the creative, the poetic faculty? Yet we must own, we are not always sure that Ristori realizes the character in itself, in all its possibilities latent and implied in every instant, as she does the character in given situations. And therefore while her impersonations do not lack the sovereign quality of imagination, it is perhaps fair to say that they are not exactly ideal. That implies a certain abstraction of the essential soul or mainspring of the character from all that is accidental and merely of the moment. That lifts the character up into a type, a something remote and real to the mind rather than to the senses, a something spiritually real, rather than actually, so that the dramatic embodiment thereof is like a thrilling vision; the change at the same time is wrought in us, and we, the beholders and the listeners, go out of ourselves, put off our everyday life to meet it; that is, we are transported. This, we take it, was the peculiar power of Rachel. Her acting was not only imaginative in the sense of rightly and vividly conceiving and presenting the successive moments, phases, incidents of character in its relations, but it was ideal. There was the type before you from the instant she came on the stage; and whatever she said or did, even if she stood motionless and dumb, you somehow felt the soul of the whole character, were fascinated and drawn into its circle, fearing it perhaps, yet charmed toward it; you realized its fate. It was not a series of points, strikingly effective and true to life. It was wonderfully quiet. The passion burned at a white heat and was colorless, consuming its own smoke. Motionless itself, it moved the little world upon the stage and all the inner world in you. But it would be impossible for us to express this so well as it is done in Mr. Whipple's admirable article in the Transcript of Monday. After happily calling Ristori's Elizabeth "a divination," and showing how English, how Tudor-English, how Elizabeth-Tudor-English ("the race, the family, the individual—all were given,") she made it, he proceeds:

But we have a right to demand, in a great dramatic artist, not only character, but ideal character. In this we doubt if any actress ever quite equalled Rachel. Sensibility, purified into passion, and passion penetrated by imagination, and impassioned imagination rooted in the soul of the character she embodied,—this was the impression which Rachel's genius conveyed. Everything about her suggested spiritual existence. The evil she represented was spiritual evil; the good, spiritual good; the beauty, spiritual beauty. There was hardly a trace of merely physical power in her acting; everything was ensouled. The result was that perfection of nature which we call ideal art—nature which is always possible but rarely actual. The strangeness in the expression of her beauty also gave her, even to the utterance of the fiercest human passions, a certain ideal remoteness from actual life. Her mere presence on the scene was a work of art. When she appeared on the stage a shock of pleased surprise ran through her audience, as at the appearance of a beautiful apparition. It was as if the Venus of Milo should start from her immortal repose, or a Pythoness step from picture into breathing and moving life.

Ristori does not possess this ideal charm to such a degree of perfection. She is, in the slang of the stage, "more human," and her characters, while they transcend those of actual life in breadth, energy and elevation, are nearer to it than those created by Rachel. Perhaps this is owing to the intensity—intellectual as well as passionate—which she throws into her embodiments, so that in some scenes she almost pains the auditors she thrills and overcomes; the personation is, perhaps, too real for the purposes of art; and the auditor's sympathy with imagined woe or wrath is suddenly turned into a twinge of the heart, as though he were troubled by the sight of actual misery or rage.

This extract sums up what we would fain say. But we could hardly apply the epithet intense to Ristori as compared to Rachel. The impersonations of the latter seemed to us, beyond those of all other actors, to be characterized by intensity. Perhaps it were better to say concentration, leaving the other word to cases of intense conscious, voluntary effort. Rachel's was the absolute concentration of all the powers and possibilities of a character in each however quiet moment of it and so her whole play was quiet; it had in the highest degree known to modern times the classical repose of old Greek art. Not the repose of indifference, but of action from the very centre. Rachel was thought cold, repulsive personally; fascination, mystery in her art, but something too remote, unsympathetic, something hardly human, something that one feared in her as a woman. But she was as far as possible from cold in the ideal characters which she assumed; there it was, as we have said, the white heat of a central passion, cold of course to all outside of its ideal world and unrelated to it. Now in Ristori, the ideal or assumed character never, even for the time being, absorbs the whole woman. There is the wonderful acting, and there is still the woman left, outside of that, with whom we sympathize and with whom hold human converse all the while; for she is one of us. Rachel was an exceptional being; there can never be another; it was the art, and not the woman that came near to us.

If Rachel was the more ideal, intense, concentrated, for that very reason her range of characters was more limited. We involuntarily think of her always first as Phædra, or next, as the sister of the Horatii, or some purely classic type. We can easily imagine that she failed in Mary Stuart, as Ristori (measured by the ideal in Rachel) fails in Phædra. But Ristori, great nevertheless in Phædra, is at home and greater still in the wide range of far more complex modern characters; she enters into the secret of one after another, reproducing them to the life, and remains the actual, human woman, remains Ristori all the while. We own the truth, the amazing power and vividness of her impersonations (sometimes we might rather say her illustrations), yet we never forget her; and there is that in her own proper character, her refined, true womanhood, that always draws us to her.

In her acting, therefore, there is much more variety, much more that appeals to the sense, much more movement and gesticulation, and much more consciousness. Studied effects sometimes disturb the general illusion, although they are calculated with a rare intelligence and the arrow quivers in its mark, sped with an electric force and certainty. But, there are thrilling points of attitude and facial expression, in which she seems to see herself and prolong them as if by a self-photographing process: for instance where Elizabeth denounces Lord Bacon, and where in the dying scene she snatches back the crown and puts it on her own head; you almost expect the side illumination of the melodrama to come in and complete the tableau. The Italian play of Elizabeth, to be sure, is a modern sensational piece; not a drama in any true sense, but a series of historical (partly fictitious) incidents in the life of Elizabeth, scattered over wide periods of her reign. It is a play of points altogether, and we would not have her make one point the less. They are admirable in their way. And it must be confessed that she creates the character in spite of the playwright; by consistent, imaginative development of the character, making it to grow before us in a series of pictures, she gives the play that unity which it has not in itself.

We have no room to review her several parts in detail. Her Mary Stuart was a beautiful whole, lacking the Stuart fascination, as Schiller's Mary lacks it, and as all attempts perhaps must lack it. The great scene of the garden, where she is first a girl again in her joy in nature and fresh air, hailing the clouds to bear her messages; and then compels herself to kneel before her enemy, only to hurl terrific defiance at her when she rises, is as great acting as we ever saw. And that sad scene of leave-taking on the eve of her execution,—one of those scenes which we commonly find intolerable—was sadder and closer to reality than we ever saw upon the stage, and yet so instinct with tenderness and beauty, that one could not turn away from it. Applause after a scene so sacred seemed impertinent and sacrilegious. If in face and form she could not look the Queen of Scots, she had every advantage for Elizabeth. Some of those old portraits at Hampton Court seemed to have become alive. We do not assent to the charge of want of queenly dignity in that impersonation; it had just such dignity as that coarse, vain, imperious, wilful queen could have, and no more. Dignity, however, is an attribute which such a woman as Ristori cannot really part with.

Her Judith had an ideal beauty in the first act, and showed a wonderful variety and wealth of resources throughout, rising to sublimity in passages, especially in those recitations from the Psalms and Prophets, where her voice grew rhythmical and was like music. How wonderfully, too, in the scenes with Holofernes, she could simulate fascination!—a very different fascination from that we spoke of in Rachel-Phadra is in the main not for her; it was only for Rachel; and yet it was great acting. Macbeth of course drew the great house, for every one could understand the play. In her very first soliloquy, with the letter, you felt that here at last was Shakespeare's Lady Macbeth; it had the true magnetic power, and you felt assured that it would go on greater and greater to the end. But alas! the Macbeth was ill and lacked all manliness and power of self-support, all memory too, and had to be prompted every word. He had left his bed that the play might go on. Lady Macbeth had the whole weight of his part to hold up besides her own; and being so preoccupied in that, we only wonder that she so succeeded throughout in at least strongly indicating, if not fully realizing, the intentions of the part as they dwelt in her imagination. The sleep-walking scene made up for all. "Art could no further go," we do believe. We will let another writer in the Transcript describe it:

You see the thrilling, the terrible picture of a guilty, broken-hearted woman, on her way to the grave. There is none of the horrible and conventional gasping, but just sufficient hardness of breathing to denote approaching dissolution, for Ristori evidently believes, as we think she should, that Lady Macbeth died of that disease to which none could minister, and not by a suicidal hand.

"Out damned spot! out I say!"

Was there ever such a washing of the hands—was ever a Queen so quickly transformed into one of Dante's spirits of hell? "Lasciate ogni speranza, O voi che entrate!" Do you not see it written on that deathly face with its cavernous eyes?

"The Thane of Fife had a wife: where is she now?"

Can you hear Ristori murmur this and then believe Hazlitt when he calls Lady Macbeth "a bold, bad woman?"

"Here is the smell of the blood still; all the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand. Oh! oh! oh!" Was there ever more terrible remorse, were there ever more pitiful sighs? They rend the heart of the audience as well as that of their victim. And that final exit! It is the fatal flicker before the going out of the candle—it is a summing-up of all the dreadful past, a concentration of superhuman power into one moment of superb action. The audience last night had endured much—they were a thousand-fold repaid. Three times was Ristori recalled. It was consummate acting.

Music in Prospect.

ITALIAN OPERA. Ristori yields the Boston Theatre, after the death of Queen Elizabeth to-day, to Maretzek's new company, who will commence a season of ten nights and four matinees on Monday, with Crispino e la Comare, the great RONCONI in the part of Crispino and Miss KELLOGG as the cobbler's wife. We are glad to see that Maretzek's programme allows such space to sparkling comic operas. We need not repeat our persuasion that this is the most genuine element there is in the modern Italian music; there is most genius in the buffo kind. Besides, there is tragedy enough in actual life; it takes a Shakespeare or a Goethe, a Gluck or a Beethoven to idealize it; and we are all growing old full fast and like to be regaled by what is childlike, lively, fresh and unpretending. Besides Crispino, we are promised the immortal Barbiere, and the Elisir d'Amore, and Meyerbeer's "Star of the North." Who will not gulp a moderate dose of Trovatore without wry faces for the sake of these? Maretzek's artists have made a good mark in Brooklyn and Philadelphia. RONCONI has been the first baritone buffo of his time; his voice is worn, but the genius and consummate art remain; if he is nearly as good as he was five years ago in London, playing Masetto to Patti's Zerlina, he will be a rare treat. Then there will be Miss Kellogg, and new sopranos and contraltos, of whom we hear good things (MILES. CARMEN, POCH, AMALIA HAUCK, ANTOINETTA RONCONI, STELLA BONHEUR, and others). The new tenor, BARAGLI, charmed the Philadelphians, and besides him are named MAZZOLENI, TESTA and BERNARDI. The brave BELLINI heads the basses, followed by ANTONUCCI, FOSSATI and that genuine, unpretending lyric actor, DUBREUIL. The Orchestra, too, will be an orchestra, for there are 45 performers promised, and a chorus of 36. BERGMANN, TORRIANI and MAX himself will take turns in conducting. On the whole a pleasant prospect.

PARLOR OPERA, at the Music Hall begins this Thursday evening, just as we have to go to press, before going to hear Don Pasquale.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The first programme for the Harvard concerts, Friday afternoon, Nov. 23, is now definitely fixed. Part I. Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon;" Schumann's A-minor Concerto—piano part by OTTO DRESSEL. Part II. Seventh Symphony of Beethoven; piano solos (Weber's "Slumber Song," arranged by Liszt, and "Invitation to the Dance"); "Leonora" Overture, No. 3,—the great one—by Beethoven. The orchestra will number over fifty instruments. The audience will be as fine in character as last year, and even larger probably in numbers. In the second concert, Dec. 7, the pianist will be CARLYLE PETERSILEA, who will play Henselt's Concerto and something from Chopin; the Symphony will be Schumann's in C (played for the first time last year); the Overtures: Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" and Schumann's "Genoveva."—Third Concert, Dec. 21. ERNST PERABO will play a Concerto by Norbert Burgmüller, and "Etudes Symphoniques" (variations), op. 13, by Schumann. Mozart's E-flat Symphony; Overtures to "Magic Flute" and "Melusina;" possibly also an aria by Mozart.

ORATORIO. The Handel and Haydn Society will perform "St. Paul" on Sunday evening, the 25th.

ERNST PERABO has returned to us, full of music and of zeal. He will belong to Boston henceforth, and such true Art and purpose as his, such fidelity to good music and the best masters, with such faculty to interpret them, will be a clear gain to our musical life here. He will play in the third Symphony Concert, and will soon begin to give Chamber Concerts—Matinees probably—of his own, in Chickering's hall, when he will play a great deal of Schubert, as well as of Bach, Beethoven and the rest. He is already receiving pupils, and may be conferred with every day at Chickering's between the hours of 11 and 12.

Mr. HERMANN DAUM's "Beethoven Matinees" will be three in number, beginning early in December. Besides several of the Pianoforte Sonatas, he proposes to play some Sonata Duos (piano and Cello); also the Trio in E flat, op. 70, perhaps the great Trio in B flat, and the Septet, as arranged with clarinet, horn, &c.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB are preparing to give at least four of their classical and indispensable Chamber Concerts. We shall soon have particulars.

A Philadelphia paper, speaking of Mr. Eichberg's "Doctor of Alcantara," falls into a marvellous confusion of ideas, when it says:

Since the appearance of the enthusiastic encomiums, lavished upon the composer and his work by the critics of his neighborhood—not to mention the immaculate Mr. Dwight, who does not like "L'Africaine," but who sees great merit in the Doctor of Alcantara, we have been expecting to discover in Mr. Eichberg our American Rossini.

A Jewsharp is a trifle compared to an oratorio or a grand opera; but may not the trifle be a pretty one, commendable as such, and the ambitious opera a failure?

Mr. HUGO LEONHARD has postponed his return to Boston until the 26th of November.

NEW HAMPSHIRE AND VERMONT MUSICAL CONVENTIONS. The Fifth Annual New Hampshire State Musical Convention will "hold forth" at Eagle Hall, Concord, during the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th and 11th days of January, 1867. Superior Boston talent is largely engaged as follows: Conductors: Messrs. Carl Zerrahn and L. H. Southard; Soloists: Mrs. H. M. Smith, Soprano; Miss Addie S. Ryan, Contralto; James Whitney, Tenor; M. W. Whitney, Bass. Pianists: Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, of Holderness, and William Graves, Salisbury, N.H. Concerts are to be given on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings. Orchestral accompaniments during the last day and at the closing concert will be furnished by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. "The Offering" and Handel's "Creation" are the principal text books for the vocalistic throng. Twelve hundred singers attended the predecessor of this convocation of music lovers last year. As a commendable growth of interest in music is shown at the present time, an immense crowd may safely be anticipated.

The Seventeenth Annual five days Convention of the Western Vermont Musical Association recently came off in the spacious Town Hall at Rutland with great eclat, an unusual quantity of professional and native amateur talent preventing any flagging in the interesting exercises of the harmonious gathering. "The Creation" was successfully produced, at the last of three successive concerts, Friday night, October 19th, to a crowded and appreciative house. Mrs. H. M. Smith, of Boston, sang "On mighty pens" and "With verdure clad" with thrilling effect, and ably sustained her well-earned reputation throughout the entire oratorio. Mr. J. E. Perkins of Boston, Basso Profondo, won laurels by his rich voice and artistic rendering of classical music. The tenor recitatives were executed by Mr. Wm. F. Leavitt, of Brandon. The sublime work of Haydn, as performed by six hundred and sixty powerful, thoroughly-trained voices, has never been surpassed out of the "Tri-Mountain City." It reflected great credit upon Conductor W. O. Perkins, also of Boston, who had entire charge of the culminating concert. Miss Addie S. Ryan of Boston was greatly applauded and repeatedly encored by zealous admirers of her songs and cavatinas, as was Mrs. Smith for her matchless efforts in the same line. Conductor L. O. Emerson was deservedly as popular as ever for his efficient and pains-taking direction of genuine sacred music. Beautiful accompaniments and taking instrumental gems were liberally furnished by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Advertised Soloists not mentioned above, comprised J. T. Newell, of Ogdensburgh, N. Y., Tenor; Rev. C. N. Thomas, of Fort Covington, N. Y., Basso; S. C. Moore of Burlington, and J. E. Perkins, pianists; all of whom, especially the pianists, were equal to their trying positions. H. A. Lyon of Shelburn, and I. M. Tripp, of New Haven, Vt., were respectively re-elected President and Treasurer. Expenses, amounting to $1000, were more than met by receipts of $1,300. "Last but not least," a new one dollar a year State monthly, called "The Vermont Musical Journal," published by H. L. Story, of Burlington, was recommended to the patronage of "Green Mountain" musicians, by the Committee on Resolutions.

The Northern Vermont Musical Association held its second Convention in the Congregational church at Bakerfield, Vt., Oct. 23rd 24th, 25th and 26th, closing with a quite largely patronized concert Friday evening. Conductor H. S. Perkins, of Boston and Springfield, proved himself a worthy member of a family of eight well-known musicians, by beating time with marked precision, and skillfully transforming "raw recruits" into excellent singers, through unintermitted good instruction. Mr. Perkins is a superior composer of touching ballads and "echoing" quartets, as well as a reliable tenor. His "Learning a foreigner to read," duet, (Parry) with Mrs. D. C. Hall, of Boston (Soprano at Rev. Dr. F. D. Huntington's "Emanuel Church" and the Convention prima donna) was enthusiastically encored at both concerts. Mr. Julius E. Perkins acceptably officiated as Pianist and Basso. Mrs. Hall (a native of Vermont, and composer of the universally known (?) "Birdie looking out for me," and other popular ballads) achieved success at a bound by her fine mezzo-soprano organ and true rendering of grave, pathetic and floridly brilliant music. Many amateurs of both sexes did well in concert songs, duets, &c. The Third (Second Annual) Convention will be holden in Franklin County, probably at St. Albans, during the early part of next January. O. W. F.

PHILADELPHIA. Meyerbeer's L' Etoile du Nord seems to have made the best hit of any of the operas presented by Maretzek's troupe. It was given on the 22nd ult., and afterwards repeated. The Bulletin says:

As it was sung, acted and put upon the stage last evening, we can recall nothing in our operatic annals equal to it. The scenery, the stage appointments and the costumes were very fine; the stage was frequently crowded, presenting most picturesque tableaux, and the general execution of the opera, by the chief artists, the chorus and the orchestra, was excellent.

Miss Kellogg has a long and most difficult role, as "Catarina," and she has done nothing here that has pleased so much, or given so favorable an idea of her powers as a stage singer and a musician. She was repeatedly and warmly applauded. The young, fresh voice and the pleasant bearing of Miss Hauck showed also to much advantage in the part of "Pras-covia," and she, too, was heartily received. Signor Antonucci, in the important part of "Peter," showed himself the thorough artist. His voice is rich, warm, sympathetic and manly, and his method is very pure, and strikingly free from some of the common faults of the modern school, such as extravagant loudness and exaggeration of manner. Signor Bellini, as the Calmuck chief, "Gritzenko," was picturesque in appearance, and capital in singing and acting. His drill of the little squad of recruits was excessively droll. Signor Baragli made an admirable "Danilowitz." His voice is remarkably beautiful in quality, and he sings in the very purest Italian style. His acting is always intelligent and graceful, and the judicious recognize in him a true artist. But because he has not great power and does not "cry aloud and spare not," after a manner much in vogue, he is undervalued by the promiscuous crowd. He is, however, a most valuable member of the company.

There are several minor parts in this opera of considerable interest, and they were cleverly sustained sustained last evening by Mmes. Flenry and Ricardi, and Messrs. Banfi, Reichardt, Voelden and Mancini. Oct. 24.—The performance of Lucrezia Borgia, last evening, at the Academy of Music, was very heartily enjoyed. Senora Poch acted with great power, and sang the music extremely well, though occasionally her intonation was imperfect. Mme. Natale-Testa made a capital "Orsini," and was encored in the drinking song. Signor Antonucci was magnificent as the Duke, and "Mazzoleni's "Gennaro" was a splendid personation, musically as well as dramatically. The subordinate parts were well sustained, and the orchestra and chorus were excellent.

Oct. 26.—The performance of L' Elixir d' Amore, last evening, was unequal. Ronconi was, of course, surpassingly droll as "Dr. Dulcamara." So artistic a representation of the Italian quack doctor has never been seen. It is better than that he gave here years ago, for he has added many new points, and refined the personation to absolute perfection. The audience was convulsed with laughter nearly all the time he was on the stage. Signor Baragli makes a most excellent "Memorino," singing with consummate skill and taste, and acting gracefully and with spirit. His delicious voice is exactly adapted to the music of the role, and it appeared to especial advantage in the romance, Una furtiva lagrima, which he sang charmingly. Signor Antonucci made an excellent Sergeant Belcore. Mme. Ronconi can scarcely be said to have made a successful debut. She has a pleasing presence and an intelligent manner. Her musical knowledge is good and she appears to sing well. But her voice, last evening, was rarely audible, whether from nervousness or weakness, it is impossible to say. It entirely failed to fill the house. Perhaps in a smaller theatre and after longer experience she may become a popular opera singer.

Oct. 27.—Ernani was very finely given at the Academy of Music, last evening. Mme. Carmen Poch, Bellini, Mazzoleni and Antonucci all distinguished themselves, and the various ensemble pieces were splendidly sung. The finale of the third act was so well done that it had to be repeated. To-day Crispino is to be repeated, for a matinee. On Monday evening Faust will be produced in splendid style, and on Tuesday Meyerbeer's Star of the North will be repeated, to gratify the universal desire of those who have heard it. Wednesday the Huguenots will be produced, with a powerful cast. Great desire is felt to hear Miss Hauck in another leading role and there is a probability that at the matinee of next Saturday, she may appear as Lucia, a role in which she is sure to succeed.

The third describing two graves under a linden, where two other lovers are sitting in the twilight, and weep,—they know not why.

The Old Street Singer.

Who would believe me, should I vow
That I was lovely, long ago?
Arosy cheek, a voice to speak
Or sing with, clear and sweet and low,
Bright eyes ashine through clouds of hair,
Were mine when I was young and fair.

The rich and great I sang before,
I sang at many a cottage door;
Of love's delight, of soldier's might,
I sang,—of pleasure, o'er and o'er.
They said my voice was rich and rare,
They said my face was young and fair.

I never thought of hearts that bleed,
I never thought of bitter need,
Of withered youth, of banished ruth,
Of listeners cold who take no heed,
Of tears and parting, death, despair,
Who thinks of these when young and fair?

Of bliss or woe my song may be,
Now no man lists my minstrelsy.
I wander on, voice, beauty, gone,
Of mine old self the mockery;
Who soothes my grief, who grants my prayer,
Now I am neither young nor fair?

Music after War. Vienna.

Translated for this Journal from the German of G. HANSLICK.

I.

FOUR-HAND PIANO READINGS—BRAHMS—SCHUBERT—WAGNER.

... My friend and I had been discussing the late war and German politics throughout our walk. Arrived at the house door, we felt as if we could not part so. Almost timidly the question arose, whether we should not make a little music? A packet of novelties lay on my piano, unopened, as the instrument itself had been for some time. Not without joyful emotion we proceeded to the little preparations; one opened the packet, the other the piano. It was a matter of course, that a beginning should be made with four-hand playing. That indeed is the most intimate, the most convenient and, in its limitation, the most complete form of domestic music-making. It is younger than our generation imagines, and owes its uprise to the rapid spread of piano-playing, to the enlargement and perfection of the piano-forte. The String Quartet, Trio or Quintet, once wanting in no good musical house, is now crowded out by it; a loss no doubt, but at the same time a help to the best possible acquaintance with orchestral literature in one's own chamber. If we turn over the leaves of the musical catalogues from Haydn's and Mozart's time till past the middle of Beethoven's activity, we scarcely meet with one four-hand arrangement where there are dozens for three, four and five different instruments. Even Beethoven's first Symphonies had long been arranged for the string quartet, before they began to set them for four hands. Now-a-days no overture, no symphony is brought out in our concerts, of which we cannot immediately get a foretaste or an after-enjoyment in a four-hand arrangement. A source of satisfaction and instruction flows for the friends of music from this modest field.—"Who is your Vierhändiger (four-hander)?" I was once asked by a passionate dilettante. His bold coining of a word, so utterly ignoring the personality and merely emphasizing the musical availability, seemed to me not so bad. A right true "four-hander" is a compendium of solid qualities; he rises in worth, the less he makes two-handed pretensions. Not every man can call a wife, a beloved one, a friend of heart and soul his own; but a "four-hander" is what every mortal should possess, like a partner engaged for the whole musical dance of life.

My four-hander, then, seizes the packet of notes, cuts, as he would a pack of cards, and reads with surprise upon one book the inscription: "Waltzes for four hands, by Johannes Brahms." BRAHMS and waltzes! The two words look astonished at each other on the ornamental title-page. The earnest, silent Brahms, the genuine disciple of Schumann, as North-German, as Protestant and unworldly as his master—he writes waltzes! One word solves the riddle; it is: Vienna. The imperial city brought Beethoven, not indeed to dancing, but to dance writing; it seduced Schumann into a "Faschingschwank" (Carnaval); it would perhaps have ensnared Bach himself in some deadly sin of a country dance. So too the waltzes of Brahms are a fruit of his stay in Vienna, and truly of the sweetest sort. Not in vain has his fine organism for a year and a day exposed itself to the light, cheerful air of Austria—his Waltzes can bring evidence of that. Far from Vienna, still our Strauss Waltzes and our Schubert's Lancers, our Gstanzel and Jodler, even Farkas' Gypsy music must have echoed in his brain, to say nothing of the pretty maidens, the fiery wine, the green-wooded hills and what not. Whoever takes an interest in the development of this genuine and deep, but hitherto perhaps one-sided talent, will greet the Waltzes as a happy sign of a rejuvenated and refreshed sensibility, as a sort of conversion to the poetic Hafiz creed of Haydn, Mozart and Schubert. What charming, lovely sounds! Actual dance music of course no one will expect: waltz melody and rhythm are treated in artistic free form and as it were ennobled by a distinguished expression. In spite of this there is no sort of artificial affectation, no over-refined detail to disturb and blur the total impression; there reigns throughout a plain ingenuousness, such as we had scarcely expected in so high a degree. The waltzes, sixteen in number, make no grand pretensions; they are short and have neither introduction nor finale. The character of the single dances now approaches the enthusiasm of Vienna waltzes, oftener the steadily rocking Landler; sometimes there sounds as from afar an echo of Schubert or of Schumann. Toward the end of the book it rings like the clink of spurs, at first softly and as it were tentatively, then more and more decidedly and fierily—unquestionably we are on Hungarian ground. In the last waltz but one this Magyar temperament comes out with roaring energy. . . No doubt this piece would have formed the most effective conclusion, but it lies quite in the nature of Brahms to prefer the finer and deeper impression to the noisier. Returning to the Austrian Landler tone, he closes with a short piece of enchanting loveliness; a gracefully floating melody over an expressive middle voice, which in the second part appears unchanged as the upper voice, while what was before the principle melody now forms the middle voice. The whole, in its transparent clearness, counts with those genuine morceaux of Art which astonish no one and delight everybody. These things of Brahms exempt the player from all bravura or extra effort, but appeal to a fine musical feeling. The several waltzes are of very different temperament; the player must divine it more from the musical ideas of each, than from the sparingly used tempo and expression marks.

We lifted a new stratum from our heap of novelties and came upon J. O. Grimm's "Suite in Canon form," published in score and four-hand arrangement by Rieter-Biedermann in Winterthur, the highly deserving, Art-appreciating publisher of Schumann's posthumous works, as well as of most of the compositions of Brahms, Theodore Kirchner, Hiller and others. The Suite of Grimm left a good impression on us since the Philharmonic concerts; we are glad to see the fine, genial web again weaving and unravelling before our senses. A still more precious enjoyment from the Philharmonic concerts of the year before last was recalled by Schubert's music between the acts of "Rosamond." Spina, whose honorable Schubert zeal now strives to bring out what his predecessors on the throne of Diabelli delayed doing, has published the two entr'actes from "Rosamond" in score, and then again in a two-hand and a four-hand arrangement. Schubert's orchestral pieces are not of those which offer difficulties to the piano-forte transcriber through fulness of parts, counterpoint, or passage work; but one painfully misses the magical grace and coloring of Schubert's instrumentation. Yet Carl Reinecke's authentic hand has done all that could be done in these piano arrangements, and he who has a lively recollection of the original will, as in life so too in Art, gratefully contemplate even the colorless portrait.

We also played together with four hands Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," in C major (published by Spina). This and a second one with like title (in D major) were favorite concert pieces in Vienna during the composer's lifetime; and only few of Schubert's compositions could boast of that. But now, while we seek out and highly prize the once unknown or unappreciated works of Schubert, his "Italian Overtures" have died out hardly leaving a trace. Schubert wrote them at the time of the Rossini fever in Vienna, partly with an ironical purpose, partly being actually smitten with the dazzling novelty of that apparition. The Rossini influence, soon after the year 1820, worked like some irresistible force of nature. Perhaps the most remarkable proof of it is, that the works of Spohr, Weber and Schubert, those three passionate opponents of Rossini, themselves show clear traces of that influence, and their biographies contain their own admission of the fact. The "Italian Overture in C," graceful in invention and effectively instrumented, gives you to be sure neither the genuine Schubert nor the genuine Rossini. Schubert had to deny his own best individuality, to imitate—but not reach that of Rossini.—What next fell into our hands was Nottbohm's four-hand "Variations on a Saraband of Sebastian Bach." We were glad to meet again with this composition, which only gains on closer and closer acquaintance.

Our four fists had gradually scooped out the best veins of the mountain of notes; only one stone, with an uncanny glimmer, lay untouched: RICHARD WAGNER. With somewhat anxious curiosity we opened the new "March of Homage," which Wagner had dedicated to the young King of Bavaria. The March begins with a sentimentally pathetic introduction, in which the inevitable chromatic whimper is at least distributed over long notes. A trumpet burst interrupts these meditations, and the homage (Huldigung) marches with a somewhat smarter step, but with exceedingly every-day ideas. We don't doubt for a moment that Wagner, when in behalf of this inspiration he called for "the list of his dressing gowns," selected the red velvet one with gold tassels, embroidered with turquoises. But unfortunately this splendor of color and jewels does not come to light even in the most inspired piano-forte arrangement, and nothing but the simple musical cut remains. We cannot help it, if this cut appears to us extremely common. The "Huldigungsmarsch" reminds us in many turns of the processions in Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, without coming within reach of either of them. We know not what sort of mystical meanings the initiated may find in this music, but we doubt if it will become particularly dear to anybody else but the generous sovereign whom it greets.

If the arrangement of the "Homage March" is a new proof of von Bülow's skill, the undertaking of his friend Tausig to set the Overture to the "Meistersinger von Nürnberg" for four hands, borders close on the impossible. The March at any rate is royal Bavarian music, but in the spectacle of the Nuremberg wolf's-glen every thought of music ceases. The Viennese public enjoyed this bloody prelude to a "comic opera" two years ago in the original, and remembers what it then had audible experience of. But what two pairs of human hands may suffer from it, he only knows who has himself tried to play it. We felt as if we were paving an endless way for ourselves with bare arms through thorns and nettles, only to reach a goal almost worse than the approach to it. We were too much exhausted by the murderous mingling of hands to play on any further, too fretfully excited to be willing to close the evening in that way, after we had destined it to peace and harmony. "This music is more vexatious than war and politics!" exclaimed my trusty comrade on my left hand in despair. What shall we do next? Like a meteor the thought occurred, that Strauss played that day in the Volksgarten, and we set out full speed for the place, as if the guild of Meistersingers were upon our heels. The Volksgarten was gay with lights and sounds, and Strauss that very moment with enthusiastic sweep of bow began his waltzes: "On the Mountains." But the victims of the Nuremberg master-song sank, breathing again, upon a garden bench, and were as blissful as if on the mountains.

(Conclusion next time).

Otto Nicolai.

As was to be expected, he soon became exclusively attached to Berlin, by bonds of art and friendship. The Opera enjoyed the advantage of possessing a conscientious and strictly artistic conductor; the Cathedral Choir had attained an almost incredible certainty in correctness and nicety, especially in old Italian sacred music; while the Tonkünstler-Verein had gained in him a trusty member, who, it is true, often supported his opinion with considerable warmth, but in every other respect was a great acquisition. A circumstance now happened to remind the assiduous artist of other and closer ties. Scarcely did his father learn that Nicolai occupied a high and important position in Berlin, ere he wrote to inform him of his poverty and remind him of his filial obligations. Otto Nicolai, the man who was represented as an egotist by many who had been estranged from him by his manners, which were frequently rendered harsh by sad experience and indisposition, forgot the sorrowful period of his youth; forgot the severe treatment to which he had been subjected; forgot the legal deed by which his father had resigned all claims upon him, and, with the most disinterested self-sacrifice, devoted himself to secure his father's future, by regularly allowing him a share, as he had already allowed his absent mother and sister, of his income. The last letter he ever wrote (according to his letter book) was addressed to his father in Prussian Holland, and contained the pension of 20 thalers, for the month of May, 1849. This act of filial piety sheds so noble a lustre upon Nicolai, that we cannot sufficiently admire it. How his father and heir behaved in return for such kindness, we shall find an opportunity of stating subsequently. Throughout his life, Nicolai honored the Fourth Commandment, though it was certainly not from his father that he learned to do so.

In obedience to the Royal wish already mentioned, Nicolai cheerfully entertained the notion of producing one of his operas. He only hesitated as to which one he should select. At length he fixed upon the Verbannter, as being most in keeping with German views, and consequently best adapted for the Berlin public. He had the parts given out, and the opera put in rehearsal. But in a moment of noble artistic excitement, looking at the work as starting from a point he had long passed, he suddenly withdrew it, promising, instead, to give the last touches to his Lustige Weiber, and get that work ready for representation. There now began another period of restless industry, the consequence of which was that, as early as the January of the ensuing year, he was able to begin rehearsing the new production. He wrote at this period to his father:

"Even in the mere composition my new opera has been a source of great pleasure to me. After all, the hours in which he creates are the happiest ones in an artist's life. If I possessed more invention, more genius, I would boldly place myself in the very first rank, for I am unusually well versed in what relates to the writing out, scoring, and employment of all vocal and instrumental resources."

Before this date, however, he had succeeded in distinguishing himself in the eyes of the great mass of the public, and causing his name to find its way among classes into which an artist's name, as a rule, with difficulty obtains access. The fact is, he had composed for the grand annual concert given in aid of the Spontini Fund, a Patriotic Hymn for chorus, solo, and full band, under the name of "Preussens Stimme" ("Prussia's Voice"). This composition concluded the first part of the above-mentioned Grand Concert, on the 14th December, Nicolai himself being the conductor. The spirited strains excited enthusiastic applause and evoked an unanimous encore. The Hymn was soon afterwards published by Bote and Bock, and, had the composer lived longer, it would certainly have become even more popular. The programme contained, in addition to this interesting number, the magnificent overture to Olympia, pieces from Beethoven's Ruinen von Athen, which were introduced by Nicolai's exertions for the first time to the public, and the first air from the third act of the Verbannter, sung by Mad. Köster in the most charming manner.

Thus in Berlin, also, they had struck the chord which always emits the purest harmony in the life of an artist: general appreciation. This feeling was destined to lead to a world-wide reputation, and the early death of the young composer, whose mind was prosecuting so many vast plans, was destined only to be the harsh and striking dissonance leading up to the most magnificent consonances. The nearer we approach this catastrophe, the more sorrowful are the feelings with which we contemplate the latest incidents in Nicolai's career, and especially the day when the light of his work was so brilliantly reflected on the worker, and when the enthusiastic applause bestowed by the public on his last and successful production should, with its mighty breath, have fanned the fire of inspiration, and of the creative powers of his mind.

There is something to which we would direct attention in Nicolai's last opera, namely: that the composer has decidedly adopted a national style, as the entire nation, though only gradually, and long after his decease, has loudly acknowledged. That, had his life been spared, Nicolai would have given us many more important works of the same kind, is a fact which, judging from experience, we cannot doubt, any more than that the circumstance of his work having, even at the first performance, achieved so unmistakable a success with the strictest public in Germany, despite the political storms by which the period was disturbed, affords evidence of its great value. Its success, moreover, increased with every one of the four performances, on the 9th, 11th, 20th, and 25th March, respectively, when the composer, who already bore within him the germs of death, himself conducted. Even the critics, who, at first were very severe in condemning the shortcomings of the work, were obliged to acknowledge the vox populi, and contribute their quota of praise, thus completely confounding the prophecy of the Leipziger Signale: "Berlin Criticism, that rattlesnake so well-known for devouring operas, is now coiling itself round Nicolai's new work, which has been performed once. Good-bye, Lustige Weiber!"

There is scarcely another German opera which has become so firmly established as a stock-piece; even the most insignificant strolling companies included it in their repertory. In Berlin it was represented seven times within the year. Thence it started upon its career of success elsewhere. On the 28th October, 1850, it was given at Potsdam; in 1851, at Dresden; in 1852, at Leipzig, Vienna, Magdeburg, Glogau, and Prague; in 1854, at Munich; in 1855, at Königsberg, Nicolai's native place; and, in 1856, at Gratz, Nicolai's name, like an echo, penetrating with his work to the uttermost confines of Germany. At Vienna, where the opera was performed to a house crowded to suffocation, and in the presence of all the imperial Court, on Thursday, the 12th February, 1852, musical recitative, supplied by H. Proch, and, by the way, very clumsily written, was introduced in the place of the spoken dialogue. We will quote, from No. 8, of the Neue Wiener Musik Zeitung of the period, a few words such as cannot be applied to very many composers after their decease:

"We have here to do with the work of a master, who, though no more one of the living, will long continue to occupy a place in the memory of the musical inhabitants of Vienna, and whose efforts and services in the cause of sacred music have been rewarded by the heartiest thanks of all lovers of art. Nicolai was the inspired founder and creator of the Philharmonic Concerts, where we have enjoyed such magnificent artistic entertainment; it was he who cried 'Halt,' in a voice of thunder, to modern music, with all its juggling tricks, and assigned it the position it should occupy."

The opera, which was splendidly put upon the stage at Vienna, was performed, during the eight months of the theatrical season, eight times to very large audiences.

It was only at the first four performances in Berlin, which, as we have already mentioned, he conducted himself, that Nicolai enjoyed the widespread fame accruing from his work. We may state, also, that he conducted, in the presence of the entire Court, at the Cathedral, on Good Friday, 1849, as he had already done some few weeks previously on Epiphany Sunday, his 97th, and shortly afterwards his sensuously fresh 91st Psalm, while in the Palace Church at Charlottenburg he conducted his grand Liturgie. Actuated by a feeling of respect deserving of commendation, the Royal Cathedral Choir still performs the same pieces on the days above mentioned.* Such were nearly the last events of any importance in Nicolai's short but active life. He was always ailing, and had more especially suffered a great deal from nervous congestion of the brain. The cold water treatment which he followed for two years diminished but did not put an end to the evil. On one of the first days of May, Nicolai, in the society of a considerable number of friends, drove out for an excursion in the environs of Berlin, and did not return till late at night. He then neglected a cold which he had, probably, caught on the occasion. To the cold were now added the old pains in the head, so that, on Friday, the 11th May, he consulted his physician, whom he accidentally met in the street. The physician ordered him to observe the most complete repose, and avoid anything like nervous excitement. He advised him, in consequence, to go to bed immediately he reached home, to be bled, and then to await his (the physician's) arrival. Hereupon Nicolai proceeded to the hotel where he always dined, and after dinner, went home to carry out his physician's orders. On his arrival he told his landlady to allow no one, except his medical man, to come up to him, and then went to bed. Notwithstanding his injunctions, a friend of his, a lady belonging to the French company, succeeded in obtaining admittance, and was heard sobbing and crying bitterly. Nicolai had dressed hastily, and gone to sit with her in a room adjoining his bedroom. It was here that, when his visitor had gone, his landlady found him, and took the liberty of expostulating with him on his disobedience of his physician's directions. Nicolai answered curtly and very violently, ordering her to bring him some fresh water to drink, and promising afterwards to go to bed. As regards being bled, he had a great dread of the operation, and resolved to defer it, at any rate until he again consulted his physician on the subject. His physician called shortly afterwards accompanied by Herr Wieprecht, Band-Master of the Royal Guards, whom he had met before the house, and who was coming to see Nicolai on some matter of business. The landlady opened the door and gave a short account of what had occurred. The physician scolded her for not having prevented Nicolai from acting as he had done. Thereupon she hastened back through the kitchen for the purpose of admitting them at the front entrance of the apartments. In her hurry she did not observe Nicolai, so that it was Herr Wieprecht, who was the first to enter, that first perceived Nicolai, near the sofa, with his face on the ground, swimming in his blood. The three ran up to him in affright, but the poor fellow was already stiff and cold, struck down in a fit. All attempts at re-animation were fruitless; he died about five o'clock in the afternoon. Notwithstanding the state of agitation in which he himself was, Herr Wieprecht immediately wrote off to Baron George von Brodow, the deceased's most intimate friend, to inform him of what had happened, and then hurried off with the news to the Office of the Intendant-General of the Theatres Royal. Everywhere did it excite terror and regret.*

The post-mortem examination proved, however, that, under the most favorable circumstances, all hope of relief was out of the question, as the diseased state of one of the most important parts of the brain, namely the arteria basilaris, in which an aneurism had been formed, must, sooner or later, have caused death. The artery had been softened and burst in consequence of some violent excitement, and so copious a rush of blood had ensued to the brain and spinal marrow that instant death was the result.

All the papers, when announcing the melancholy event, expressed their deep regret at greater or less length. The most touching obituary notices were the article by Rellstab, who had given Nicolai, when a youth, his letters of introduction to the world, and that by Kossak. The latter says, among other things, in the Constitutionelle Zeitung of that date:

"For us, the companion of his own age, and born in the same province, the tragical element in his early death, that which most moves us, consists in the fact that he, who over the wine cup, or in a serious discussion, always listened with eager attention, though often our opponent, should now be dumb, and wiped, by unkind Fate, from out the combat, like a mere cipher, precluding us into the endless knowledge of truth without having previously decided many weighty differences of opinion."

A mark of distinction which had been intended for the living was of no value to the dead. At the General Meeting of the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, Otto Nicolai had been created an ordinary member, simultaneously with Ferd. Hiller, Dorn, J. Schneider, Tomaschek, Lindpaintner, Lachner and Auber. Before, however, he could receive the news of his election he was no more, having died on the 11th May, the very day on which the election had been confirmed by the King.

The 15th of May was selected for restoring to the earth, from which they sprang, Otto Nicolai's mortal remains. To take part in the sad ceremony, there assembled at the house of mourning, generally so peaceful and charming a retreat, whence only the sacred tones of art were wont to issue, the head of the Theatres Royal, Herr von Küstner, the Intendant-General; all the members of the Royal Orchestra, Opera and chorus; the members of the Singacademia; and all the musical celebrities of Berlin. The numerous procession, headed by the Tonkünstler-Verein, which was followed by one of the Royal carriages, slowly wound its way, through the long Friedrich-Strasse, towards the Oranienburger Thor, where Herr Wieprecht with the band of the 2nd regiment of Guards received the corpse, which, amid the solemn strains of the chorale: Jesus, mein Zuversicht, it accompanied to the Dorotheenstadt Church yard, in the Liesenstrasse. Already waiting there were the company of the Theatre Royal, and the members of the Cathedral Choir, who began singing the profoundly serious chorus from Wilhelm Tell: "Rasch tritt der Tod den Menschen an," which, from being so singularly applicable, produced a more than ordinary impression. The Rev. Herr Vater then delivered the usual funeral oration, which simply dilated upon the various circles that were painfully afflicted by Nicolai's death. Next came a touching four-part composition: "Im Arm der Liebe ruht sich's wohl, Wohl auch im Schoos der Erde," sung by the solo singers of the Royal Opera house. Like a sacrificial flame, the splendidly managed harmony ascended from the quiet spot dedicated to decay, where the foliage rustled as it was gently moved by the wind, rising towards the blue sky, slightly flecked with small white clouds, while the twittering larks, ignorant of care, mingled their song with the strains from below. The power of this holy moment left no one untouched; scarcely an eye remained tearless, during this ceremony, celebrated in honor of an artist whom a dark and inscrutable fate had suddenly, with iron force, snatched away from the most hopeful earthly career.

At the public meeting of the Academy of Fine Arts, the Director, Herr Schadow, pronounced a short eulogy on the deceased.—Through the liberality of the Tonkünstler-Verein, a monument was placed over Nicolai's silent grave. It was solemnly uncovered on the 11th of May. A chorale, executed by trombones, opened the ceremony. The Cathedral Choir sang Nicolai's 31st Psalm, and then Flodoard Geyer delivered an oration in honor of his memory. The proceedings were closed with a chorale sung by all present.

Nicolai possessed an agreeable though not imposing exterior. His stature was rather under the middle size, but he was stoutly formed and well proportioned. His bearing, in accordance with his somewhat southern manners, was light, animated, and erect. His pale face wore nearly always a joyous expression, increased by his light blue eyes, which could not be called large. His mouth was overshadowed by a light-colored moustache, and sometimes assumed an expression of amiable cordiality that went to the heart. His voice was sonorous, strong, flexible, and excellently adapted for conveying his directions when he was conducting. But he was more particularly assisted in this task by an extremely delicate ear and a cultivated taste. In his intercourse with strangers, he was open, polite, and, when necessary, fond of showing he was a polished man of the world. In consequence of this he was almost anxiously scrupulous and neat in the very smallest details. The plain and correct hand-writing of his literary efforts and scores, in which most careful erasures conceal the alterations, was reflected in everything connected with his exterior, for he was invariably almost pettily exact in the blameless elegance of his attire. In other respects, he was simple, uniform, and modest. His favorite luxury was works of art; on all his tables were beautiful vessels, books, and music; on all his shelves, busts and gypsom-casts; and on the walls, portraits of artists; but his great pride was, after all, his valuable musical library. He was indefatigable in the study of other masters; some classical work or other was nearly always open on his piano, while he who was frequently described as a vain deus minorum gentium, with an overweening idea of himself, would often sit for hours before it. Yet he was conscious of his own worth, and fond of hearing or reading laudatory criticism of anything he had done in the way of art. He was not exactly very liberal in meting out praise to other artists, but to the few whom he had found good grounds for admiring, he paid enthusiastic respect. He was found to entertain the same feelings by the few friends who remained unchanged towards him, despite the bitterness often infused in his manner by his bodily ailments. It was among them that he sought his most pleasant hours, which he found more particularly in the open air, where he felt more joyous and contented than anywhere else. This was why he so delighted in country trips. It was a heavy blow for him, so capable of making a sacrifice himself, if any one he supposed his friend felt hurt and withdrew from intercourse with him in consequence of some one or other of the observations to which he sometimes unthinkingly gave utterance. Too proud to be the one to make the first advances, he was unhappy on seeing himself alone, and avoided by any person to whom in his heart he was warmly attached.

It must not be supposed, because Nicolai had never married, that his heart was insensible to the charms of female beauty.* On the contrary, after what he himself designated his first ohreless passion for a young Countess, about 1828 he had been bewitched by many a pair of black or blue eyes in Italy, Austria, and Hungary. He never conceded too much, however, to the fair, and this or that hour of foolishness failed to be dangerous, because he always preserved his own free will. Yet it is very certain that his amiable and clever vein of humor, which always asserted itself, whenever he did not, as was frequently the case, take too gloomy a view of existence, was distinguished in the society of beautiful women by a peculiar touch of graceful wilfulness, which could not fail to enlist every one in his favor.

* This was in the year 1857. At present scarcely more than one or two pieces of Nicolai's have been retained in the church service.

Such was Otto Nicolai; an artist and, let people say what they will, a genuine German artist moreover, moderate and always active, benevolent and amiable in private life; in art joyous and enthusiastic for everything great, a true servant of Apollo, one who sang with the deepest feeling whatever inspired him, until the kiss of death closed the lips so rich in melody. From the very beginning his profoundest feelings he confided to songs, and even Gerber's Tonkünstler Lexikon acknowledges that, in this branch of his art, he possessed genius. His last tones took the form of a song, which he wrote the day before his death.

* Twice, however, was Nicolai on the point of marriage. The first time was in May 1840, at Trieste, where he was betrothed to M<sup>lle</sup>. Erminia Frescolini, the vocalist, from Orvieto, but, as he said, she deceived him, and in May, 1841, married Signor Pomi, the singer at Milan. The other time was in 1846, when he might have obtained the hand of a young and handsome Viennese, the daughter of a deceased brewer. She was to have a dowry of 50,000 florins. But, in his eyes, her defective education, together with the subordinate rank of her family and relatives, could not be counterbalanced by material advantages, whatever they might be, and he broke off the match, though it was desired on all sides.

In a Gondola.

[Suggested by Mendelssohn's Andante in G Minor, Book I., Lied 6 of the "Lieder ohne Worte."]

I.

In Venice! This night so delicious—its air
Full of moonlight and passionate snatches of song, And quick cries and perfume of romances, which throng
To my brain, as I steal down this marble sea-stair,
And my gondola comes.
And I hear the slow rhythmical sweep of the oar Drawing near and more near—and the noise of the prow—
And the sharp, sudden splash of her stoppage—and now
I step in; we are off o'er the street's heaving floor,
As my gondola glides
Away, past these palaces silent and dark, Looming ghostly and grim o'er their bases, where clings
Rank seaweed that gleams flecked with light as it swings
To the plash of the waves, where they reach the tide-mark
On the porphyry blocks—with a song full of dole,
A forlorn barcarole,
As my gondola glides.

II.

And the wind seems to sigh through that lattice rustgnawn
A low dirge for the past: the sweet past when it played
In the pearl-braided hair of some beauty, who stayed
But one shrinking half-minute—her mantle close-drawn
O'er the swell of her bosom and cheeks passion-pale, Ere her lover came by, and they kissed. "They are clay,
Those fire-hearted men with the regal pulse-play;
They are dust!" sighs the wind with its whisper of wail:
"Those women snow-pure, flower-sweet, passion-pale!"
And the waves make reply with their song full of dole,
Their forlorn barcarole,
As my gondola glides.

III.

Dust—those lovers! But Love ever lives, ever new,
Still the same: so we shoot into bustle, and light,
And lamps from the festal casinos stream bright
On the ripples—and here's the Rialto in view;

And black gondolas, spirit-like, cross or slide past,
And the gondoliers cry to each other: a song
Far away, from sweet voices in tune, dies along
The waters moon-silvered. So on to the vast Shadowy span of an arch where the oar-echoes leap Through chill gloom from the marble; then moonlight once more,
And laughter and strum of guitars from the shore,
And sonorous bass-music of bells booming deep From St. Mark's. Still those waves with their song full of dole,
Their forlorn barcarole,
As my gondola glides.

IV.

Here the night is voluptuous with odorous sighs
From verandas o'erstarred with dim jessamine flowers,
Their still scent deep-stirred by the tremulous
showers,
Of a nightingale's notes as his song swells and dies—
While my gondola glides.

V.

Dust—those lovers!—who floated and dreamed long ago,
Gazed and languished and loved, on these waters,
—where I
Float and dream and gaze up in the still summer sky
Whence the great stars look down—as they did long ago;
Where the moon seems to dream with my dreaming —disc-hid
In a gossamer veil of white cirrus—then breaks
The dream-spell with a pensive half-smile, as she wakes
To new splendor. But lo! while I mused we have slid
From the open—the stir—down a lonely lane-way Into hush and dark shadow; fresh smells of the sea
Come cool from beyond; a faint lamp mistily
Hints fair shafts and quaint arches, in crumbling decay;
And the waves still break in with their song full of dole,
Their forlorn barcarole,
As my gondola glides.

VI.

Then the silent lagune stretched away through the night,
And the stars,—and the fairy-like city behind, Domes and spires rising spectral and dim: till the mind
Becomes tranced in a vague, subtle maze of delight;
And I float in a dream, lose the present—or seem To have lived it before. Then a sense of deep bliss,
Just to breathe—to exist—in a night such as this;
Sust to feel what I feel, drowns all else. But the gleam
Of the lights, as we turn to the city once more,
And the music, and clangor of bells booming slow,
And this consummate vision, St. Mark's!—the star-glow
For a background—crowns all. Then I step out on shore.
The Piazzetta! my life-dream accomplished at last,
(As my gondola goes).
I am here: here alone with the ghost of the Past!
But the waves still break in with their song full of dole,
Their forlorn barcarole,
As my gondola goes;
And the pulse of the oar swept through silvery spray
Dies away in the gloom, dies away, dies away—
Dies away—dies away—!

The Italian Opera in Paris.

[Translated for Every Saturday from the Revue Moderne.]

There are two growths of the last century whose influence has extended to our day, and become wide-spread,—one the French idea, and the other the Italian opera. I would not compare them for importance, and I have no desire to weigh the glory of the cavatina in the same balance with that magnificent march of mind which stirred up worlds and brought about the explosion of '89. It is only that these two things, so dissimilar in every respect, grew up and wrought their wonders at the same time, that I mention them together. There were intervals when the music of Italy drowned the philosophy of the Encyclopedists themselves; and coextensive with our critical and liberal spirit spread this marvel of Italy. It was the fashion for kings to become Voltairians and dilettanti; and nothing would do but they must have both the French philosophe and the Italian martri at their courts. So it came about that not a capital nor first-class city but had its Italian opera. Its geographical empire has stretched from Moscow to Lisbon, from Dublin to Constantinople, in the Old World, and covered every part of the New. It is not only that its genuine productions are everywhere, but its influence permeates the German and French schools. Guillaume Tell, Le Freyschütz, Les Huguenots, La Juive, La Muette, are only Italian (!) under another nationality. Weber and Meyerbeer are as much at home among the Italians as farther north. However interpreters may be indispensable, and however imperfect the sweet tongue of the South may be in certain respects, it is still the one universal language in music.

In America they have the Italian opera alone. In Russia, in England, in Spain, it is still the Italian which predominates, notwithstanding the commendable success of their native muse. The country, however, which has produced the Freyschütz has no occasion longer to envy the lyrical fruits of the land of Cimarosa and Rossini, nor to borrow from them. Still, we can see that in spite of the masterpieces of Weber, and the national fervor which he inaugurated, and Mendelssohn and Schumann continued, and Wagner transported almost to a certain terrorism,—in spite of this, the Italian opera has still preserved its rights at Vienna and Berlin. It would seem, indeed, as if Germany were glad to preserve the memory of the land beyond the mountains whence it derived its own impulse, for it can be shown how the whole dynasty of their great musicians,—Handel, Hasse, Mozart, Gluck, and Meyerbeer,—have all worked at the start in the lead of the Italian spirit and form.

In France, where the tragic and comic opera, long since perfected, have developed in accordance with our national traits in a manner quite different from the tradition of the Italians, it has nevertheless happened that we have given the foreigner a firm position among our public institutions. Not long since it received a subsidy from the state, and there are not a few among our artists and amateurs who pray that it might be given it still. The Théâtre-Italien has at least preserved the qualification of the Imperial favor, which it shares with the Grand Opéra, the Opéra Comique, the Comédie-Française, the Odéon, and the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Its claims are ancient,—going back to those musical representations which took place at Lyons in 1548, and which Brantôme minutely describes as being totally unlike anything they had known in France. Since this first visit of the Gelos (as they called the Italian drolls of the sixteenth century) repetitions of such events did much to incite a taste with us for the lyrical drama, and to stimulate our composers to exercise their skill in this department. I write of this thing carefully, for I do not wish to be confounded with the historians of music, who have flippantly asserted (and been believed) that our dramatic music sprung from a mere imitation of the Italian, since personal and national traits have stood in the way of this; and, however we may have borrowed the form in general, it has been essentially French work and French inspiration that have animated our creations. When, for example, we refer to the Ballet Comique de la Reine, organized in 1581 by Baltazarini, an attendant of Catherine de Medicis, in imitation of the Feste Teatrali of Florence we shall find that the poetry was that of La Chesnaye, and the music by the king's musicians, Claudin Lejeune, Salmon, and Beaulieu,—and this ballet was the constant model of all those that subsequently flourished under Henri IV., Louis XIII., and Louis XIV.

If we consider the very important influence of the Italians (brought hither by Mazarin) upon our own opera, we must still discover that the earliest French scores of Lambert and Lulli differed essentially from those of Rossi and Cavalli, and that our lyrical drama at the outset was carefully distinguished from the Italian. With that exception, we will cheerfully acknowledge that the presentations of Euridice and La Finta Pazzo supplied to our French poets and composers the idea of the opera.

It was precisely the same with the comic drama. Doubtless the first operas of the Italian drolls represented at Paris determined the vocation of Monsigny and Philidor; true it is that Grétry begun his studies in Italy, and that the translations of sundry Italian operettas marked a sensible advance in the style of composition and the taste of the masses; nevertheless, we must not forget that the comic opera existed with us before that Italian invasion of 1752, and that even afterwards all the masterpieces of this sort, like Les Troqueurs, Rose et Colas, Tom Jones, and even the Devin du Village of Rousseau (that ardent neophyte of the Italian school,) showed less in common with the Servant Padrona than with La Chercheuse d'Esprit of Favart and the other little comedies of the Saint-Laurent Fair. Still, the Italian influence was a stimulant; and the result, if not imitation, was emulation,—and that is much better. This is, however, at variance with the awards of the historians generally. They hold the Italian school to have reached much nearer perfection than ours at that time, and gauge all our composer's merits by their slavish adaptation to it, counting a departure from it a crime and any national character of no avail. When we come down to Gluck, it could no longer be said that the type furnished by Pergolesi and Jomelli was the only one. Their preponderant influence was set aside, or at least contested. Some years later, it was a German, Mozart himself, who gave even the Italians the most beautiful of models; still later, Weber offered the world those masterpieces, which excelled in elevated conception and profundity of style even the growth of Italian suns, and became more worthy than such to be taken as subjects of study and admiration.

What is true of the works is also true of their interpreters. The school of Italian singing is admirable; and they have attained in it the ideal in a certain sense, but in that only. While admiring and studying it, our artists have been right in following another instinct and creating another taste. It is easily said that Lemaure, Sophie Arnould, and Saint Hubert sing badly; but when La Servante Maitresse of Pergolesi was played at Paris alternately in Italian and French, and the rôle passed from La Tonelli to Mme. Favart, there may have been a loss of conventional skill, but there was no diminution of spirit, nature, or grace. According as we approach our time, the prepossession becomes less marked. It must be granted that Mme. Branchu, the sublime interpreter of Gluck, and Garat, the head professor of our Conservatoire, could well equal the Raffanelli and the Grassini, and that the late M. Martin had some merit in his line. During the Restoration, the Italian school flourished indeed supreme. Paris had the joyful privilege of such an assembly of singers as had never before been known, and probably never will be again. At the same time a repertory of an order at least equal begun to grow up at the Opéra Français, and it was Rossini who was laying its corner-stone; and there were singers too of our own, like Nourrit and Mme. Falcon, who were able to sustain the honor of the French name.

It is said that Duprez came from Italy transformed. The fact is notorious; but it is rather a laughable commentary, that he came back less an Italian than he went. He brought back a style, taste, and dramatic sentiment totally at variance with that which Rubini has shone in with equal but not superior talent. By a single chance, too, the Opéra and the Conservatoire began the education of Mario, who so soon relapsed into his own national style and became the most Italian of tenors. The kind of exchanges among the schools is multiplying yearly, and to-day it has become a matter of course. How many German and French artists have passed to the Italian stage! and it would be a difficult matter so say on which side is the greatest obligation.

We are not very partial to this sort of communion, which risks the confusing of style, taste, and talent. In spite of brilliant exceptions, we are still of the opinion that the music of a country has a better chance of being written and executed by the national artists, and that by no other means can we hope to reach an ideal excellence! It is a principle that we hardly dare stand by, because it is at variance with the customs and tendencies of our time. There will come a day, however, when we may weary of this confusion of tongues,—this musical Babel. For the present there is no longer need of saying more of the Italian school of singers; and in saying in, we do not withhold our admiration for certain artists whose talent has I know not what air of exception, which only goes to prove our rule. When Patti came to us from America and England, she was only a great artist of fantasy: year by year she has formed a style at Paris. Franchini, who consecrates to Verdi a little too exclusively her fine voice and pure taste, is doubtless a singer by nature; but a better drilled and better modulated voice, a more conscientious as well as more diverse method, and the scenic knowledge of Faure, would prove more to her than a good school, if there can be a question of schools to-day.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, NOV. 19.—On the last day of October, Steinway's new music hall was "inaugurated" by the first concert of the Bateman series. A large, well built concert room has long been needed in New York; and the enterprise of the Messrs. Steinway has now supplied this want. The acoustic success of the hall is complete, the seats are roomy and comfortable, and the new (sun) light very natural and agreeable. As Boston people are fully acquainted with the merits of Mr. Bateman's concert troupe, it will be unnecessary for me to say anything on that subject; Madame PAREPA's glorious voice, Signor BRIGNOLI, Messrs. ROSA and MILLS have been gladly heard here again, while the success of the new candidates for popular favor, Signori FERRANTI and FORTUNA has been no doubt satisfactory to these gentlemen. HATTON's pianoforte accompaniments are quite refreshing; so good an accompanist is a rara avis. The orchestral portions of the programme are very pleasant additions.

Mr. THOMAS gave his first Symphony Soirée on the twentieth of October, at Irving Hall; the programme was as follows:

Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," ... Wagner.
(New)
Aria, "Che farò senza Euridice, (Orphée)..... Gluck.
Miss Antonia Henne.
Concerto for Piano, G. op. 58..... Beethoven.
Mr. Wm. Mason.
Rondo, "Non più mesta," (Cenerentola)..... Rossini.
Miss Antonia Henne.
Symphony, C..... Schubert.

Wagner's composition is very heavy, and unpleasant; in it he coquets with contrapuntal forms and leads into nothing but unsatisfactory results—except in regard to noise; of that he gives us more than enough! Schubert's magnificent Symphony was very well played by the orchestra. Mr. MASON's playing of the Beethoven Concerto was excellent, full of expression and understanding. He gave his own cadence in the first movement, and very ingenious it was in harmony and in arrangement of different themes, although a little more bravura would have improved it. Miss HENNE, who sang on this occasion, possesses a sympathetic and agreeable mezzo-soprano voice, of considerable flexibility, but her part does not lie in the execution of such difficult arias as gave us, especially that of Gluck.

The Sunday Evening Concerts formerly given at Irving Hall, and now transferred to Steinway's, have become decidedly successful with the public. The programmes are made up of symphonies, overtures, etc., by Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, and other composers, played by an excellent orchestra under the direction of Mr. THOMAS, with vocal and instrumental solos by various artists. At the last two of them, lately, Madame PAREPA sang, and as finely as we have ever heard her, arias by Handel, Haydn, etc., with very great effect. The other members of the Bateman troupe acceptably assisted; Signor FERRANTI, in a "Stabat Mater" air, apparently finding it difficult to avoid gliding into his more familiar rôle of Figaro. CARL ROSA awakened a genuine burst of popular enthusiasm by his fine playing of Bach's splendid "Chaconne;" his audience would evidently have been well pleased to hear it three times. Mr. MILLS gave Chopin's Romanza and Finale from the Concerto in E, with great taste and finish, on a resonant Steinway Grand.

Mr. WOLFSOHN has commenced his afternoon Beethoven recitations in Steinway's small room; from what we hear, with only moderate success.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave their first concert of the season on the 17th, in Steinway's Hall. Here is the programme:

Symphony, No. 2, in C, Op. 61..... R. Schumann.
Scena ed Aria, for Soprano, Op. 94, "Infelice!"..... Mendelssohn.
Fräulein Natalie Seelig.
Concerto No. 5, for Piano, in E flat, Op. 73..... Beethoven.
Mr. Carl Wolfsohn.
Nächtlicher Zug, Episode from Lenau's "Faust."
(1st time)..... Liszt.
Aria from "La Clemenza di Tito," "Parto, ma tu ben mio,"..... Mozart.
Clarinet Obligato by Mr. E. Boehm.
Overture, "Columbus," in D, (1st time).... G. F. Bristow.

Schumann's beautiful Symphony was finely played; although we think Mr. BERGMANN took the tempi of the Scherzo and of the last movement much too fast. Both movements would gain in clearness and ensemble if played somewhat slower.

Unless we have the passage from Lenau's "Faust"—which Liszt here paraphrases, before our eyes, it is almost impossible to divine the composer's intentions while we listen to the music. What is the meaning of this murmuring among the basses, this dramatic threatening of the deep clarinet tones, this bell-ringing, this catholic choral, which gradually winds through the whole orchestra? Spite of our acquaintance with Lenau's text, we could not admire the work, although it has moments of power naturally to be expected from a man of Liszt's calibre. As to that portion of the public immediately surrounding us, they laughed! being evidently in the dark as to the meaning of the work, owing to the absence of the passage from Lenau explaining it; which absence was all the more noticeable on the programme from the presence of the long explanation of Mr. BRISTOW's "Columbus."

This overture does not indeed require an explanation, its meaning is easily understood; the march, the hymn, the three cannonades on the big drum, the trumpet signal all define before us in an approved order; while the composer's melodies possess those features with which we are already well acquainted. The instrumentation of "Columbus" gives evidence of Mr. BRISTOW's long orchestral experience.

Mr. WOLFSOHN's rendering of the Beethoven Concerto was on the whole rather unsatisfactory. It is only an artist of a deep spiritual and poetic nature who can make us forget in a measure his deficiencies in the execution of certain technical difficulties which are necessarily encountered in a work of this class. Mr. Wolfsohn appears to comprehend in part how Beethoven should be played, but he has so far only mastered him in one direction, we mean: in the smaller details. Breadth of conception fails him. In the performance of those parts of Beethoven's compositions which most impress us with the sense of greatness, Mr. Wolfsohn is, to use a slang expression, "not quite up to the mark."

Miss SEELIG possesses naturally a fine and powerful mezzo-soprano voice, but unfortunately in spite of this great advantage, her want of school and style are constantly apparent.

The talented composer and pianist, Mr. GOLDBECK, will give a Pianoforte recital on Wednesday in Steinway's Hall, when he will produce a new Concerto of his own.

Mr. THOMAS at his second Symphony Soirée, next Saturday, promises us Beethoven Ninth Symphony.

New York is especially favored in orchestral concerts this season. Besides the Philharmonic, Symphony and Sunday series, we have now Wednesday popular concerts in Steinway's Hall, under the management of Mr. Harrison and well conducted by Theo. Thomas.

Costa's "Naaman" at Cincinnati.

[The following letter reached us minus the first sheet of the MS. From other sources we learn that "Naaman" was performed in Cincinnati, on the 18th inst., by the Harmonic Society, and with great success. The principal singers were Mr. E. Hermanson, bass, in the part of Elsha; Miss Virginia Smith, soprano; Miss Jane Sullivan, soprano; Misses Mason and Heimbach, contraltos, and Mr. Rogers, tenor.]

GLENDAL, O., NOV. 15.—We are greatly indebted to the Society's director, CARL BARUS, an indefatigable worker in the cause of good music, a very able leader, possessing the peculiar energy and tact which this office requires. Through the five stormy years that are just passed, music would have woefully gone down in Cincinnati, had it not been for the untiring exertions of this earnest worker. He now has a strong, healthy, new organization to work with, made up of the best musical talent in the city. It numbered at its recent concert a chorus of 143, and an orchestra of 32, numbering in all 175 members. A generous and wealthy merchant, the very embodiment of public-spiritedness, is his right hand man, and president of the Society. And lastly, the great audience that filled Mozart hall from floor to ceiling on the evening of "Naaman's" production—shows the good will and generous sympathy accorded to the Society by the public.

Now let me say a word as regards the work itself. I know through personal acquaintance, with what delight the singers of Lancashire took hold of it last year. But I have not seen the criticisms in the English journals. Let my impressions then go for what they are worth, for they are only mine. I may sadly lack the right discrimination, but to me the Naaman seems a sort of nondescript—a confusion of oratorio and opera—too profane to be the former, and a little too tedious and tame to be the latter. There is something here which recalls to mind the sacred dramas of the middle ages. As I listened to a succession of dramatic yet solemn and impressive scenes, rendered indeed with much feeling, and occasionally an almost Italian pathos, I wondered if, after all, this might not be that kind of compromise between the sacred and profane, which we in puritan America are to come to. If an effort is to be made to popularize Sunday evening concerts, that is to furnish profane music in a sacred garb, is not this work well adapted to the purpose? Judged by the old standards of Haydn and Handel, or even of Mendelssohn, the music of Naaman is not, in the established sense, sacred. It is pleasing, in places extremely beautiful, and contains much elaborate and scholarly writing; it is impassioned, fervid, and appeals to the heart, and occasionally fans the soul too with a pure strong breeze from heaven, as in the firm and chaste choral movement, "When famine over Israel prevailed," and in the Angels' chorus when taken up tutti: "Holy holy, holy Lord." But withal it is not that peculiar music of the soul which we have been accustomed to look for in the oratorio, as distinguished from the music of the heart or of the passions which we enjoy in the opera. And yet it would be too much to say that this work of Costa's inaugurates a new school of oratorio, unless indeed we call it an eclecticism, for we have not pure new material, but rather the sweet echo of many and widely various sweet sounds, which, as they catch the ear, remind us now of this, now of that which we have heard before. Thus when the composer is in the sacred mood, as in the beautiful duet: "I sought the Lord and he heard me," he is Mendelssohn, impassioned with somewhat of Italian heat, and glowing with a more luscious and gorgeous sunshine than that of either England or Germany; but again, when the soldiery is introduced with a triumphal march, and the chorus: "With sheathed swords," surely here all prophetic scene and circumstance vanish away, and instead of ancient Judea we find ourselves in the court-yard of some valiant Crusader, and we hardly know whether Wagner or Gounod is most successfully imitated in the music. Among the most satisfying because most original and genuine passages of the work, I think one would place the beautiful tenor solo: "Knowing death," and the spirited bass solo: "Lament not thus." In other parts the composition is tame, and in one passage the boy's recital of his dream in heaven, there is something unmistakably trivial. The angel's chorus begins admirably but falls off sadly as it proceeds. Palestrina is the commonly reflected model in this style of composition; his pure chords and strange but sweet transitions have a certain supernatural effect, and awaken wherever heard a certain sacred or religious emotion. But in this chorus Costa soon abandons the pure, severe style in which he begins, and we have elaborate accidentals and modern discords, not at all of the angelic kind. In losing simplicity, this chorus more than any other, loses strength and meaning. Is it to be wondered at that the boy recalling it as "he heard it in heaven," remembers only the first strain.

The production of this oratorio in Cincinnati is an event of which we may be justly proud. But it will be a matter of far higher pride for our Harmonic Society and our musical public when the Messiah, "old and hackneyed" as some may consider it, is produced as well and listened to as attentively as was this pleasing novelty of Naaman.

The Italian style of singing is almost exclusively in vogue in Cincinnati; and certainly the sturred intervals which characterize it are far better suited to this Italian-like music of Costa than to the severe and classic forms of the old masters.—These require a certain square-cut, crystal-like expression and therewith—an exalted religious and artistic feeling.—The only serious fault to be found with such compositions as Costa's is their tendency to hinder the advancement of popular taste toward the higher musical level and to vitiate the style of sacred or oratorio singing. It delights the hearer with a kind of sensuous pathos without reaching to the inner and more spiritual plane of the mind. It leads the singer to indulge in mere utterance of sentiments and to neglect the stronger thought and emotion of the soul. In this way it breaks down the distinction between the sacred and the profane in music, mingling the two in an unsatisfying and in the end necessarily tame and meaningless confusion.—Such of course need not be the result of our choral societies, singing such oratorios as Naaman.—All that is needed is good judgment in the leader, which may pleasantly vary the studies of the singers, and while admitting many styles of music for practice and recreation, still never lose sight of distinctions proper to be preserved, and never allow that which is highest and best to be crowded from its place by that which is of inferior worth although it may be, for the moment, more pleasing. ### Italian Opera.

MAX MARITZKE and singers came in as Ristori left, and for a fortnight the great fashionable crowd which the Italian Opera of this day peculiarly addresses, the musical demi-monde, so to speak, (of course we do not mean in any moral sense) has been at fever heat. If a crowded theatre five nights and two afternoons in one week (with some falling off, to be sure, when very old favorites, like Sonnambula, Lucrezia, Trovatore, &c., are given), followed by increase of appetite the second week, be any proof, Italian Opera is still the most popular of all forms of musical entertainment. Its audiences, however, are peculiar; one wonders where so many well-dressed, even showy people, whom the oldest theatre and concert-goer never saw before, can have come from. Not only a new generation have sprung up, but new social elements seem to have flowed in on the tide of business. Not the highest culture of Boston, not those most deeply imbued with the love of art and music, give the tone, the dominant complexion to an Italian Opera audience, as in the days of Truffi and Benedetti, of Bosio and Badiali, of Mario and Grisi; but one who has just seen these elements assembled night after night to see Ristori, now looks round on a strange sea of faces in the great Boston Theatre; of course not without more or less admixture of the other class, but this time exceptionally, or occasionally, as when some particular opera or some rare avis of a singer is announced. Italian Opera relies for its success on getting up a feverish excitement; good-bye to all quiet, temperate, wholesome musical joys the moment you enter its charmed circle, if you stay there long enough to get familiar with it. For you must take it all at once, night after night, and matinees besides, or not at all. It is a kind of fever that burns over and exhausts the soil for the time being.

Nothing relies so much on flaming and grandiloquent advertisement, on the fulsome eulogy of youthful critics for the press, who seem to have no thought left for any other music. And then, the tendency to exaggeration which runs through all its performances, a fault which only seems to grow upon the most experienced singers, makes it at least questionable whether for artists this can be the best school. Add to this the disposition of managers to run upon merely effective, showy operas, and apparently avoid as much as possible the noblest compositions, those whose music is immortal, like the operas of Mozart, (even, in the light, humorous kind systematically postponing Rossini's "Barber" for things which have not a title of its melody and genius—and that frequently in spite of promises, as in the present case.)

How far Italian Opera is a blessing and how far an evil to the cause of music, is too great a question to discuss here now. Of course, under its ample folds it covers many a good thing; and we prefer to assume that it does do good in the long run. We only speak of it in its present tendency, as nowadays administered; of the now dominant fashion of the thing. Could we have it on a more regular, established, quiet footing; twice a week, or so, instead of every night; or always, like the Drama, the year round, an opportunity always open, but not demanding such absorbing attention through a feverish little "season;" and with frequent presentations of the intrinsically best operas, it might then take its place with Oratorio and Symphony among the highest means of musical culture. But now it is more a thing of fashion and excitement than of Art.

The Opera which Maritzke now brings us has many points of excellence. Of course, we cannot be so green as to chime in with so much newspaper talk about these weeks being an era in our musical history and this the most brilliant company we ever had. But we can truly say that its ensemble is very much above the average. In point of orchestra especially, and of chorus, and generally of mise-en-scène, it may challenge comparison with any of the previous Italian visitations. All works, with few exceptions, smoothly and effectively together. It is something, too, to have the reins of musical direction sometimes in such a hand as Bergmann's, while Max himself and the other man are not bad.

The repertoire has been varied and much of it fresh and truly interesting. Of Verdi there has been only the Trovatore and Ernani—rare abstinence for these times—but quite enough. Of Bellini, only the Sonnambula, which is ever fresh and beautiful, among the best of quiet, unpretending things for wear. Donizetti's best, in the serious vein, Lucrezia and Lucia, have been given once. The rest fall under two heads: the sparkling comic pieces (Crispino e la Comare, L'Elisir d'Amore and Fra Diavolo), and great heavy, showy effect pieces (Gounod's Faust, and Meyerbeer's "Star of the North" and "Huguenots"). The comedy has been delightful.

Passing now to the principal singers, although the troupe combines much effective talent and accomplishment, it includes not one great artist, with the single exception of ROWCOOT, for years the prince of baritones and lyric actors; of late years limited to buffo rôles, in which his acting is consummate, full of the genius of fun, only too quiet, perhaps, to be appreciated by all. His Doctor Dulcamara is inimitable; the Italian quack becomes a character in his hands. Equally so his Crispino, cobbler turned doctor, "medicus soprapfano." He was never famed for voice as such; but it has power enough, and though he avoids sustained passages of song (this excluding him from serious rôles), yet he contrives to give you all along assurance of the master of the true, expressive art of song, as well as recitativo. His singing of a few phrases now and then somehow seems to indicate the whole, and the picture gives you the impression of fine art even though many lines are faded. Crispino is a pretty little opera; the music commonplace enough, but graceful and lively, suited to the situations. Leave out the fun, and the music would have little claim on you. The best thing in it, therefore, is the funniest, the Trio of the Doctors, where BELLINI's splendid baritone and buffo talent was so good a match for Ronconi. The part of Annetta is particularly suited to Miss KELLOGG's voice and highly finished, fluent vocalization; and she acted it prettily, though with too much of that self-consciousness which is apparent in all her performances. The only attempt at sentimental, serious music in the piece, is in a couple of lack-a-daisical, absurdly ornate, sweetish airs for the tenor, sweetly enough sung, often (the first night) out of tune, and with painful straining and prolonging of a cadence note beyond all reason, by the light organ of Sig. TESTA.

Of sopranis and contraltis there is, singularly, but one experienced and distinguished artist, namely Miss KELLOGG, who is applauded to the echo still in her Margaret, her Zerlina (Fra Diavolo), her Catherine in the "Star of the North," a part which she makes quite piquant, and where her silvery notes revel with rare grace and agility in Meyerbeer's long flute obbligato passages. All the rest are young debutantes. One of them, however, a prize. Miss AMALIA HAUCK, the maiden of seventeen, pretty and graceful, full of the charm of youth and naturalness, with a true soprano voice that vibrates purely and sweetly, a voice of real character and substance, although not a large one, but fresh and sympathetic, by her remarkable impersonation of the Somnambula, and of the more trying part of Lucia, created a delightful sensation. There is no resisting this charm of youth and innocence, when it has talent, tasteful instinct, good culture, and enough freedom and self-possession, as in this case. It must be admitted that she already sings artistically, beautifully, good both in simple song and in bravura. If it seem undeveloped to full power and evenness, it is chiefly in that running passage work, which can only be learned; the want is atoned for by nameless little graces which show themselves instinctively, unconsciously, sometimes in the most simple phrase or passing from one note to another. Her acting too is natural and graceful; good as far as it goes; the more refreshing that it is all within bounds; for it is the tendency of the whole school of Italian Opera to go too far. We were particularly pleased with this moderation in the crazy scene of Lucia, a sort of scene from which we almost always shrink, it is so painfully overdone. In the pretty part of Prascovia she fairly shared the laurels with Miss Kellogg's Catharine, in the duet almost equally matched as to singing, and with more charm of voice. We fear the trusting of so delicate and pure a flower to such a school as the Italian opera. Will Verdim get hold of her? Will she too have to give in to the fatal habit of exaggeration?

Another debutante, soprano, the young daughter of Ronconi, appeared as Adina. She has charm of person and of manner, acting well. Her voice is thin and sounds old for her, and her execution, though in a good school, is not very effective. Sonora CARMEN POCU, a Spanish lady we suppose, has voice and energy enough, with considerable fire, and quite fair declamation, for the strong Verdi heroines and Lucrezia Borgia, but does not strike us as remarkable. Of the contralti, Mme. NATALI TESTA, has a boy-like, rather hard and blatant quality of voice, with forcible, but not even delivery, and more vigor than grace of action; Miss STOCKTON (Fairy in Crispino) sings much out of tune; and Mlle. STELLA BONHEUR, whom we did not hear, appears to have made a poor impression as Siebel in Faust.

Of tenors there is not one really good. Sig. MAZZOLENI has a disagreeable quality of voice, the one virtue of which is strength; it serves for the Verdi parts, and in that school he seems to have contracted the overstrained way of delivering his tones, exaggerating the emphasis, and bringing the house down (the less musical part of it) by great bursts and prolongations of a strong high note. Cheap eloquence whose main art consists in setting common thoughts and phrases in big capitals! and that is what the modern effect school brings it to. Much of the art of this day—of the artists as well as the managers—is mainly advertisement; no one dares take the risk of being genuine and quiet; but each must advertise his every and least effort by doing it bigly rather than naturally and truly. Sig. BARAGLI, a lighter and sweeter tenor, also strains to outdo himself in climax passages; otherwise his ordinary singing would be quite acceptable.

The strength of the present troupe is really in its basses. Besides Ronconi, there is BELLINI, superb in voice and capital in singing and in action as ever; and ANTONUCCI, with grand voice and stately figure, admirably suited to such parts as Peter the Great and Duke Alfonso, an artistic singer and less prone to over-do in action than the rest of them.

PARLOR OPERA. Besides Italian Opera on the grand scale, we have had it in little, and in English—a first experiment—in the Music Hall, on Thursday evening, Nov. 3. It proved much more enjoyable than we had dared to expect, and indeed we had a very clever, tasteful and artistic presentation of Donizetti's Don Pasquale. The piece was well suited to the powers employed. Miss FANNY RIDDELL, easy and lively in action, entering well into the humor of the thing, has a fresh and pleasing voice, which she uses with good skill and expression. Her Norina made a very agreeable impression on the large and in great part truly musical audience. So did the sweet, sympathetic tenor and tasteful, well-schooled delivery of Mr. JAMES WHITNEY, who does not promise to become an actor (on this occasion, too, he was severely suffering from a diseased eye,) but who sang the Serenade, especially, with such chaste beauty of style that he had to repeat it. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, as Dr. Malatesta, was the most at home of all upon the stage, moving gracefully and entering into the part con amore, while his resonant baritone told admirably throughout the great hall. He is indeed a capital singer. Dr. GUILMETTE had the most to do in the way of impersonation, as the gouty, amorous old Don Pasquale; his make-up and comedy were quite amusing and his trained and heavy bass voice, though in the deeper tones drowned sometimes by the orchestra, in the main brought out the music of the part effectually. He in the general contrivance and rehearsal has been the prime mover and driller and the success of the enterprise, as a whole is probably largely due to him. Mr. WHITNEY, who had acted as Conductor in rehearsals, did not appear in the performance, but left the post to the elder SICK, who at once led the little orchestra of twenty instruments and served as metronome to what passed on the stage. The orchestra played nicely and clearly; only, for those voices and in that hall, the accompaniment was frequently too powerful. The improvised stage arrangement and little stock of scenery was in good taste and keeping—all that could be desired. The great space at both sides of the stage and the great size of the Hall were the chief drawback to the full effect of the operetta.

This served to dwarf it and put it too far off. In a small theatre, like the Howard Athenæum, the thing would have been still more enjoyable.

On Thursday evening last, Lucia di Lammermoor was to be given, also in English, with Mr. JOHN FARLEY as Edgardo.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The first, on Friday of this week, falls just between our two days of going to press and publication. Therefore we must report of it next time.

The programme of the second Concert, Friday Afternoon, Dec. 7, will consist of the splendid Schumann Symphony in C, first introduced here by these concerts last winter, the overtures to "Genoveva" by Schumann and "The Hebrides" by Mendelssohn; Henselt's extremely difficult and interesting Piano-forte Concerto, to be played by Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, who, besides that, will give for a piano solo an Impromptu in C-sharp minor by Chopin.

To obviate a complaint often made last year of the too great length of the concerts, and to make sure of getting through by six o'clock, the Committee have given positive orders that the Overture shall always begin precisely at four. The audience must be settled in their seats before the hour, at the risk of losing the first piece and disturbing others.

ORATORIO. To-morrow evening the Handel and Haydn Society will produce Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," one of the noblest models in that form, with even better force of chorus and orchestra, and after more thorough drill than last year, when they gave it for the first time with such decided success. The whole orchestra of the Symphony Concerts will be employed, besides the Great Organ under the skillful hand of Mr. LANG. Mr. ZERRAHN, of course, will conduct. The solo singers will be: Miss HOUSTON, soprano; Miss KATE RAMETTI (first time), contralto; Mr. SIMPSON, of New York, tenor; and Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, bass.

Mr. ERNST PERARO will commence early in December his series of Piano-forte Matinees, at Chickering's under the title of "Schubert Matinees," to indicate that Schubert's Sonatas, &c., works crowded with fine musical ideas and full of inspiration, but far too seldom heard, will enter largely into the programmes—in fact form the staple thereof. But other masters will not be neglected; Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, and others less familiar, will take their turn, sometimes in concerted pieces. Two principal features of the first matinee will be a Suite by Handel, in D minor, and Schubert's Sonata, op. 122, in E flat major.

Mr. DAUM's "Beethoven Matinees" will run along in alternation with them. These too must not be forgotten.

A DESIDERATUM. In the making up of concert programmes there is no element more puzzling than the calculation of the time which various pieces will occupy. Strange to say, there is no authentically recorded measure of the length of the well-known Symphonies, Concertos, Overtures, Quartets, Sonatas, &c. Often as we hear them, often as musicians play them, no one ever thinks to take note by watch of the precise moment of the beginning and ending. If some first-class musician, such as Mendelssohn, or Reinecke, or Hiller, would but fix, record and print in a convenient little book the precise time which all the several Symphonies, Concertos, &c., consume in a proper rendering, it would be an invaluable service. How many hearers in our Symphony Concerts will be thoughtful enough to take observations by way of contribution to this end?

Mr. L. W. WHEELER has been appointed teacher of singing at Dr. Dio Lewis' institution at Lexington.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. Mr. Eben Tourjee, who is zealously laboring to lay the foundations of a Conservatory (Musical Institute he calls it now), has arranged a series of classical soirées of chamber music. The first was given on the 13th of this month at Musical Institute Hall, and excited great interest. The performances of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of Boston, the piano-playing of Mr. B. J. Lang and Mrs. H. M. Smith's singing almost exhaust the eulogistic superlatives of Providence critics. The programme consisted of Spohr's Jessonda overture (the quintessence thereof only, of course); the Aria: "Par to, ma ben mio" from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito; Liszt's transcription of Weber's Polonaise in E (which Mr. Lang played with such clat at the Symphony Concerts last year); Beethoven's Quartet in A, No. 6, op. 18; a Song: "your name—the bees are humming it," composed for Mrs. Smith by T. Ryan; and Mendelssohn's D-minor Trio, played by Lang, Schultze and Fries.—Ernst Perabo, also, has played one evening to the pupils of the Institute.

Speaking of Mr. Tourjee's Institute, we are reminded of an important accession just made to its corps of teachers by the engagement of Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK as its leading professor. The Providence Journal hails the event in glowing language:

Prof. Goldbeck is a Prussian by birth, and having but recently entered his thirty-second year, is still a young man. He was born at Potsdam and studied under the celebrated pianist Litolf, and such was his innate genius for music, his power of application, and the rapidity of his progress, that at the early age of seventeen he was called, through the influence of the famous Alexander Von Humboldt, to the court of King Frederick William, where the delight and surprise occasioned by his playing was so great that he was very shortly afterwards required to give a second performance, soon after which, the King made him a present of a very splendid pianoforte. The youthful artist subsequently went to Paris, under the special protection of Von Humboldt, and studied there for several years—gaining admittance, in consequence of his brilliant talents and distinguished connections, to the first circles of the French aristocracy.

Afterwards, he went to Hungary, and having been favored with high introductions, passed some time there most pleasantly, in the first society. Upon leaving Hungary, a distinguished noble lady gave him, among other letters, one to the late Duke of Devonshire, under whose kind and munificent patronage, the gifted and accomplished artist enjoyed social honors and artistic triumphs, in England, of the most flattering character.

The persuasions of Dr. Hugh Doherty—a well-known scholar whom Mr. Goldbeck met at the house of Dr. James Garth Wilkinson—coupled with a strong desire on the part of the artist to see America, finally induced him to come to this country, where, as many of our readers are aware, he has resided for several years with great professional success as a pianist, composer and teacher. Thoroughly familiar with the works of all the eminent composers, he is one of those men, so rarely to be met with, who, with a complete musical library at hand, will sit down and play, "on call," (as the bankers say) effectively and elegantly any composition of any of the great masters, from the earliest to the latest. As a theorist, and as a composer for the voice, for the piano and for the orchestra, he enjoys a high reputation; and we should also add that he is a very good scholar, speaking and writing both the French and English languages with remarkable correctness.

The critiques on his public performances and his compositions—including some elaborate ones for the orchestra—which have appeared in the leading journals and musical reviews of Germany, London and New York, are very numerous and flattering.

The engagement of Mr. Goldbeck as the leading professional man of the Musical Institute, is as we have already remarked, a most important event in the history of this excellent and flourishing institution. Through the rare talent, energy and perseverance of its originator and director, Mr. Tourjee, the Musical Institute has become the large, well established and very valuable educational seminary it now is. Mr. Tourjee's thorough acquaintance, however, with the musical conservatories and other institutions in Europe, acquired during his residence abroad, and his own sound judgment in regard to the requirements of his establishment here, has long rendered him sensible of the importance of securing for it the services and influence of a professional man of commanding talents and high and wide reputation.

The course of instruction in the Providence Musical Institute is very systematic, very comprehensive and very thorough, embracing everything connected with the theory and practice of the art, and including, of course, musical composition, the cultivation of the voice and all kinds of vocal and instrumental practice. The Institute is finely located in a large and convenient building containing not only a great number of rooms adapted to all the varied wants of such an establishment, but also a commodious and handsome hall for concerts, soirées or lectures. Instruments and apparatus of all kinds are provided, together with a very valuable musical library. The teachers are all gentlemen of high attainments, large experience and fine preceptorial abilities, and are untiring in their efforts to advance the pupils in their studies. And we would remark here, that in addition to the regular course of private instruction in the Institute, the pupils have, free of any expense, the very important advantage of hearing lectures on all branches of music, attending most profitable and interesting class instructions, and listening to a variety of excellent musical performances.

CARL ROSA, the young violinist of the Bateman concerts, has at length taken that position in New York which was from the first accorded him in Boston. The enthusiasm which he awakened here last winter was in singular contrast with the coldness with which he had been received by New York audiences and critics. Most of the latter had scarcely mentioned him, while they bestowed all their praise upon the singer and the cornet-player; some patronizingly said: "Very well for one of his age; with study he will improve, &c.; while others, like Mr. Watson, of the Tribune and the Art Journal, only mention him disparagingly. But this is all changed. Rosa has completely won the great audience in Steinway Hall during these last weeks; and, as will be seen by our New York Correspondence, his playing of Bach's Chaconne, before an immense crowd, was encored with the greatest enthusiasm. The musicians crowded round him and assured him that his position was now taken, and the critics had to chime in. The World says:

Mr. Carl Rosa's playing of Bach's "Chaconne" was superb. Although the piece is not of the popular order as regards melody the difficulties are such that, while they tax the performer's powers to the utmost, they are, as is seldom the case with compositions of this kind, appreciated at once by the audience. The piece is certainly the finest, in respect to execution, that Mr. Rosa has yet given us, and justly deserved the burst of enthusiasm that greeted its conclusion.

JOHN K. PAINE, our organist, writes us from Berlin, where he is warmly received by his old musical friends and teachers, and will probably remain a few months, having a good prospect of there bringing out his Mass. He says the musical season has begun with the Symphony Soirée of the Royal Orchestra. The first excellent.

The programme was: Symphony in B flat, Haydn, Overture to Anacreon; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Overture to Leonore, No. 3." (How like our own Symphony Concerts that sounds!) "It was refreshing to hear a grand orchestra again. The performance of the Anacreon Overture was a revelation, and the Minuet of the G minor Symphony was played in a masterly style. I did not like the tempi of the Finales. Haydn's little theme danced like a jumping jack." Young Osgood, the tenor singer who left Harvard College with the last class, is with Paine in Berlin, and is making great progress in his vocal studies. Mr. Paine's Mass is thus noticed by one of the leading Berlin critics, Flodoard Geyer, in the Spenische Zeitung:

"A genuine German musical spirit breathes through the work, which, built up in the school of Bach and Handel, yet reveals throughout the writer's own creative power. Especially is the Crucifixus of worth; it reaches some of the best models."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Is that you Andy? or "My Policy." Song and Cho. J. Hutchinson and W. Kittredge. 30

A very good-humored and taking thing, in which the "joke" of the piece is indicated by the title. In the chorus, the Soprano inquires, "Is that you, Andy?" To which the tenor meekly responds "Yes, 'tis him, with 'My Policy,'" to which the chorus, responding, shouts, "You can't come in! It's no use standing there a-knocking!" Good for political meetings, and funny enough for both sides to laugh at.

Cock-a-Doodle-doo! S'g and Cho. Robertson. 30

An English comic song, and quite "jolly," the wit culminating, in each verse, with a stentorian crow.

Rosina. When the moon is shining. Como melodies. 30

Altogether charming. The melody is graceful and easy for the voice, the poem pretty, and the provincial Italian, in which the foreign words are written, with its queer turns and idioms, will remind persons who have travelled in Lombardy, of peasant life and language near the beautiful lake of Como. Has an English rendering of the words.

How long wilt thou forget me. Q't. Southard. 40

Happy art thou. Quartet. " 40

Very good and classical, like the previous ones.

Effie May: Song and Chorus. A. B. Hoag. 30

A fine ballad, in popular style, with good music.

Christmas Carol. Song. J. B. Marsh. 35

A pleasing sacred song, in time for Christmas.

T. T. Barker. 65

The well-known melody of the "Guard's waltz," gracefully fitted to Italian and English words by Mr. Barker.

Where the wild flowers blow. Song. C. Gounod. 30

Very sweet, and not difficult.

Jessie Vane. Ballad. F. Buckley. 30

Jessie was a "Vane" thing, to be sure, but the song about her is none the less pleasing.

Instrumental.

Deux Nocturnes. Op. 32. No. 2. Chopin. 40

Warum? (Why?) For Piano. R. Schumann. 25

Because this piece is short, do not suppose it easy and trifling. Every note is carefully and ingeniously fitted to its true position, to elaborate the leading idea, and the whole is a sort of prolonged inquiry, which the strange ending still leaves unanswered.

La Gazza Ladra. Fant. brillante. J. Leybach. 75

A Fantasia Brillante is just the thing that Leybach can write well, and this is a good specimen of his powers. Somewhat difficult, but not extremely so.

Adele waltz. D. Godfrey. 30

Keeps up the character of the composer for brightness and general pleasing effect.

Marseilles Hymn. A. Baumbach. 40

One of the very best arrangements of this national air, and well fitted and fingered for learners. Of easy medium difficulty.

Happy Farmer and First Sorrow. Two easy piano pieces by R. Schumann. 20

Carefully elaborated, but much simpler than "Warum?" mentioned above, and as excellent for young learners. The Happy Farmer sings a right happy song with his left hand.

THE ABBÉ LISZT.

This time we had nothing new for four hands, but we took turns singly at the piano: one player and one listener. Several piano compositions of Liszt's most recent ecclesiastical period excited our interest especially; no one who ever had to do with the remarkable man can free himself from the after-working magic of his personality, which occupied us to-day more lively than its musical offerings. Turning over the leaves we were reminded of a letter of Alexander von Humboldt to Varnhagen, in which he declares that he has grown old enough never again to be astonished even at the absurdest thing. "Only," concludes the letter, "only the Hungarian honorary monk remains a riddle to me." That honorary reception of Liszt into the status of a Hungarian monastery, to which Humboldt alludes,—a monastery which had been extremely hospitable toward him, was little more than an act of courtesy on both sides, without binding consequences. Why should not the fantastic man of metamorphoses, who appeared in Jena in the German student's jacket, in Pesth in the embroidered Magyar frock with sabre and spurs, and otherwise in other places, why should he not once too feel the poetic contrast of the cloister habit and dream himself a Capucin for one day? But when about a year ago Liszt actually received consecration at Rome, it naturally created some sensation, for, judging from his course of life and temperament, the celebrated pianist did not seem especially predestined for a priest. But who can see into the inmost depths of a human heart! Who would be rash enough to judge a step, which is only conceivable as bridging an abyss of spiritual conflicts, and which with strong force of self-denial breaks a life into two halves?

We had seriously endeavored to explain this step psychologically from Liszt's nature, and succeeded so far as to find it singular, to be sure, but not incomprehensible. Was it then so unnatural, that an easily excitable, fanciful man, who from his childhood had been tossed from one triumph to another, and in a wildly stirring life had tasted all enjoyments, honors and excitements to excess, should now in his fifty-fifth year feel painfully satiated and unsatisfied? That he should fall from the most intoxicating enjoyment of the world into the opposite extreme of an ascetic piety and turn his eyes away from this world, which he knew too well, to another unknown world? We believed in fact that Liszt longed to put off all worldly striving with the worldly costume, and meant henceforth, untroubled by the shrieks of fine society, to find true rest in pious contemplation. What happened was precisely the reverse. Liszt, who for some time before his priestly consecration had kept himself concealed behind the Sixtine clouds of incense, stepped suddenly and briskly forth into the sinful world. He hastens from Rome to Pesth as king of a musical festival prepared for him, conducts there in his ecclesiastical garb his "Saint Elizabeth," and kindles up the Magyar public by his piano-playing. Thereupon he plunges into the artistic vortex of Paris, brings out his Festival Mass with great pomp, and is there reported—so witty is this human life—to have converted a frail sister to virtue by his holy piano-playing.

The worldling Liszt played miraculously, the Abbé Liszt plays miracles.

Since he became a priest, Liszt has published quite a number of piano pieces: Transcriptions from Mozart's Requiem and from Pergolesi's "Sacred Melodies"; a "Hymn to the Pope"; finally two "Legends" for the piano, which appear to us particularly characteristic. They treat of a miracle of St. Francis of Assisi ("La Prédication aux Oiseaux") and one by St. Francis de Paula ("St. François de Paule marchant sur les Flots"). As the French preface relates to us at length, Francis of Assisi once met a flock of birds upon the highway and preached them a sermon. The birds listened attentively and did not stir from the spot, although the Saint, walking among them, brushed them with his robes; only after he had pronounced the blessing did the birds fly away, in the exact form of a cross, to the four quarters of the world.

Some sailors at Messina once refused to take St. Francis de Paula on board their boat; the Saint made no ado about it, but walked off with dry feet over the sea. Of the first Legend Liszt very modestly remarks, that his small skill and, perhaps too, the narrow limits of musical expression on the piano-forte have compelled him to fall very far short of the wonderfully overflowing fullness of the bird sermon, for which he supplicates "le glorieux pauvre du Christ" for forgiveness.

If after all this you examine the two pieces of music themselves, you find two ordinary brilliant concert études, one of which spins out for a musical motive the twitter of birds, and the other imitates the roar of the sea. The pieces are grateful to a virtuoso, and not without some piquant spice of dissonance; of course the bird preaching provides for the bravura of the right hand, and the walking on the waves for that of the left hand. These compositions might just as well have been called "Les Amours des Oiseaux" and "Souvenir des Bains d'Ostende," and ten years ago they probably would have received these titles. Perhaps Liszt will one by one bring the rest of the Saints before us in the same pleasant manner. We must confess, this rigging out of the saintly halo for the concert hall, these hammering and trilling miracles make an unspeakably childish impression on us.

We were, as we said before, actually of the opinion, that the Abbé Liszt would be in earnest in his renunciation of the world, and would bid adieu with all his heart to musical salon efforts. Were we mistaken in that, then there was still a second way conceivable: the complete separation of the artist from the priest. Many of his friends repeatedly expressed the opinion, that Liszt's main object in his new choice of position was to attain to complete material independence. Little as we may concur in this explanation, which does not well harmonize with Liszt's always noble and disinterested way of thinking, equally little have we any right, in case it be the true one, to condemn the motive thus alleged. Various circumstances, unknown to us, and perhaps very important, may have coöperated here, and circumstances, according to Rahel, are the ministers of the gods. On this second supposition (namely, that not any necessity of faith, but motives of outward thrift led Liszt to become a priest) it would have seemed natural to us that, in coming before the Art world as a composer, he should not emphasize the priestly character, but ignore it as a purely inward and domestic matter. For the Vatican he would have been the new Abbé, for the musical world he would have remained the old Liszt, the same Liszt, who had celebrated Shakespeare, Goethe and Byron with his Symphonies, and merely the modern virtuosity with his piano pieces. We would have trusted in his having courage enough to leave his music untoursured. This amalgamation of the spiritual title with secular performance, this playing Abbé and being Liszt, or playing Liszt and being Abbé, is precisely what we find it hard to reconcile ourselves to in this newest phase of the distinguished man. The salon bigotry of the "Legends," coupled with the composer's haste to produce himself before a Hungarian, a French, a German public in the Abbé's mantle and, thus equipped with a new charm, seek the long shunned publicity again, must have astonished the defenders of his true spiritual calling. If his "Saint Elizabeth" is a work that sprang from a pious enthusiasm, a work made for the glory of God, why does Liszt strive against the earnest wish of our music-lovers to have it performed in Vienna? To the artist surely the executive means and the musical culture of Vienna offer at least not poorer guarantees than Pesth; and to the pious servant of the Church it cannot possibly be of serious consequence that the outward success of the work be secured beforehand, as it was in Hungary. So there is not a little to lend plausibility to the theory, that Liszt is grafting worldly scions on a religious stock.

In this singular position and activity the Abbé Liszt has in musical history one predecessor of striking similarity: the famous Abbé Vogler. We wonder that this double has been nowhere remarked upon. The Abbé Vogler (born 1749, died 1814) was a man of unquestionable geniality and brilliant many-sidedness; one with whom surely it is no dishonor to Liszt to be compared. Renowned as a writer and a composer, as a virtuoso of the piano-forte and the organ, Vogler by his richly endowed, original nature played a brilliant part in society and exercised a sort of magic over his pupils and admirers. In the descriptive, poetizing tendency of his music he in a sense foreshadows this "Music of the Future;" he played on the organ the "Death of Duke Leopold upon the Sea," the "Siege of Jericho," and the like. To his admirers Vogler was a miraculous man, to his adversaries an ingenious charlatan. Vogler's successes in Vienna in 1803 and 1804 about represent for that time the Liszt enthusiasm of our day. To-day he would direct an Oratorio in the Theater auf der Wiede; to-morrow he would give an Organ concert; and on the third day celebrate with the greatest pomp high mass in the Church of St. Peter, the music, roaring down from the choir, being of his own composition. The vain Abbé was always dressed in a wide-skirted black frock, black satin breeches, red stockings, and shoes with yellow buckles. He wore the grand cross of the order of St. Louis on the left breast and the little Abbé's cloak of black silk fell back over the left shoulder. The Abbé Vogler could not forego a certain measure of charlatanry in any of his functions; especially did he know how to heighten his artistic nimbus admirably well by the religious one.

Forkel's Almanac tells how Vogler, "when he is to play at anybody's house, sends his prayer-book before him, and, after being there awhile, suddenly gets up, goes into another room, where he suffers no soul to come near him, and there prays out of his book."

To such vain comedy we are sure that Liszt—in our estimation the more sincere and more significant artist—will never sink. But the outward resemblance and the inward affinity between these two marvellous natures is unmistakable, and so the two Abbés do us as it were the service each to explain the other.

The Italian Opera in Paris.

The Théâtre-Italien is less far removed from an ideal perfection than most, and needs but little effort to realize that condition. The present administration seems to us, above all, to attach itself to the fortunes of some maestro of the hour. It lavishes upon its patrons the works of Verdi as long as they will bear them, and perhaps longer. We know that such seasons prevail at Milan and Naples, and that the theatres there are still more given up to Verdism, if possible; but we likewise know that the dilettanti of Paris differ greatly from those of the Peninsula, where they are only capable of enjoying one kind of music at a time, and carry their rage for that sometimes to a fanatical excess. Rossini has eclipsed for them the old masters; but to-day they adore nothing but Verdi, and will adore him until they drop him at once and completely. At such a time, perhaps, the Trouvère and Rigoletto will still be played at Paris. If any Italian exclaims at this statement, I ask him what has become in Italy of Rossini's youthful works, which made so much stir among them fifty years ago, and which are now nowhere played but among ourselves? The French dilettante is less fanatical, but he is more faithful. Lively and giddy as was the favor with which we received Rossini at first, we never offered Mozart or Cimarosa as a sacrifice to our admiration of him. This faithfulness is the complement, if I may so speak, of our French hospitality. We have had with us so many geniuses from all parts, that it would be difficult for Verdi, a new guest, to monopolize our mansion, and claim all our sympathy and admiration. He is much liked indeed at Paris; they have in the repertory of the Grand Opéra two of his works, two at the Théâtre-Lyrique; and he ought naturally to have a large share of consideration at the Italian opera; but any undue predominance will surely react against him, and we might pass from extreme favor to extreme injustice. We should soon tire of such exclusiveness, and cry out for the ideal emotions of Don Juan, the infinite grace of the Nozze, the wholesome and delicious gaiety of Matrimonio, the sparkling spirit and exuberant wealth of Rossini, the elegiac tenderness of Bellini, and the fine passion of Donizetti.

In prosperous seasons, a succession of some twenty operas, giving three nights to each, are given before an audience who are subscribers for the entire season; and it needs all the power of custom and fashion to render the same kind of music endurable during these six months. It is true that lately we have seen Donizetti dispute occasionally the sway of Verdi, but the two are much too near alike to offer the proper variety, and we have but occasional ruptures of this monotony in Le Barbier and La Somnambule; while our artists, from long disuse, are wholly unprepared to offer us the possible variety of their resources, that might come from the happy alternation of Rossini and Mozart, Bellini and Pergolesi, Donizetti and Paisiello, Verdi and Cimarosa. The ancients and moderns, far from obscuring each other, would be separately enhanced by the contrast.

The preceding administration at the Italian opera, urged by the critics, had begun this career, without regretting it. Così fan tutte, restored after a neglect of forty years, was the great success of the winter of 1863,—enough alone to offset the fortunes of Patti, and to prove that an Italian theatre may be something else than the theatre of the latest musical lion.

I know that the principal obstacle is not in the preferences of the director, but in the sluggishness and stunted education of the artists. They come for the most part from Italy, with attainments that they have no care to increase; the old répertoire, of which they are ignorant, is naturally their aversion. It is an obstacle, but not an insurmountable one. Naudin was astonished to find his great success in Così fan tutte, which, it is reported, he had undertaken with no little distrust. In that pretty romance, Una Aura Amoreosa, he saw himself suddenly the hero of the season. Le Mariage secret, gotten up with scarcely greater hope, disproved likewise their fearful apprehensions, and never has a work been better performed, with the marvel of song and acting which Mmes. Penco, Alboni, and Marie Battu gave to it.

No one has ever denied that Le Nozze di Figaro is superior to Così fan tutte and Le Mariage secret; but how is it possible that five or six years could pass without finding them on our boards? and at their last revival they could scarcely reach a third night. No one will dispute the ideal worth of Don Juan, and yet it was laid aside after the second performance, and last winter we had it only once. Is this the fault of the public? Assuredly not, since Le Nozze reaches its three-hundredth time at the Théâtre-Lyrique. The same house has at this moment in rehearsal the Don Juan of Mozart, as well as the Grand Opéra, and we can safely predict a double triumph for our old master. The reason is simply this,—that on the stage of the French opera they take pains to study what they have to do, before offering it to the public. It was my fortune some years ago to be present at these rehearsals at the Italian house. They ordinarily gave but one to each piece. The performers merely hummed through their parts to assure themselves their memories were not at fault; and the orchestra went through their share as carelessly. As to the stage business and situations, they were left to be devised impromptu on the evening of its performance. Such a course might do for Linda or Maria di Rohan, but for Don Juan it is quite another matter, and for reasons that it is hardly necessary to enumerate. A work so complex and delicate in both vocal and instrumental detail demands a choice of performers (which they do not give it), repeated rehearsals, and annual repetition, to insure its excellence. All this, it is true, supposes a faithful and well-mated company. But the case is far otherwise. The interests of our theatre are united with that of Madrid, and the performers have to pass and repass the Pyrenees in the performance of their duties, beside whatever may be done on lesser engagements at Rouen and Brussels. Such a singer will be engaged for only a month and a half, perhaps; such another for a given number of evenings. They arrive here, make the theatre an inn, as it were, for a few days, and then they are gone; and what perfection can we expect of them? They have neither time nor desire to improve. They sing a few repetitions of their three or four favorite parts, which one can't blame them for doing; but unfortunately their favorites are those of all the rest, and so we are continually supplied with just the same music.

With a fit company it of course must be otherwise. Each singer will feel himself obliged to be prepared with a due variety; and a new opera is esteemed a piece of good fortune rather than otherwise. No one is content with what he has done, but is constantly striving to do better; and by repeated fellowship they grow mutually dependent and jointly superior. Beside this, such a prolonged community of labor works as favorably upon the public, and their education becomes reciprocal. Such experience gave us Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, Malibran, Sontag and Grisi. I hold it for certain that the prime cause of their perfection consisted in their being trained to each other. It was diamonds polishing diamonds.

The advent of a marvellously gifted singer like Patti is always a good fortune for the theatre, the public, and art; but it may nevertheless be turned to evil, and give place to reverses, servitudes, and disappointments; and the critical moment of such a change can be indicated with precision. It is when admiration degenerates to unreasonable infatuation, and when the public is blinded to both the faults of its favorite and the merits of its fellows. The result is discouragement to all others, and the public has no longer a company, no longer a theatre, but only an idol.

It is needless to say that it cannot be otherwise, and that extraordinary genius always demands this as a condition. Did Le Kain prevent the success of Prévile, the Dumesnil, or the Clairon? Did Talma eclipse the Duchesnois or Mlle. Georges? Did Mlle. Mars suppress Molé, Fleury, or Monrose? This perilous supremacy of Mlle. Patti has only one precedent,—an illustrious one, and within short memories. Rachel had the fatal power of crushing all about her on a stage that had incontestable merit in such others as Beauvallet and Ligier. We all remember how the house used to empty itself as soon as Rachel had spoken her last verse, without pity for the other performers that remained to go on; and, what is worse, without any respect for the masterpieces of Racine and Corneille. Usually a comedy of Molière closed the performances; but it was given to empty benches, despite the talent it brought forth in Samson, Geoffroy, Provost, Regnier, and the rest. Assuredly when Rachel left us it was a cruel eclipse, and a loss irreparable for art. Nevertheless, it must be said that the repertory has regained its rights, and the theatre has recovered its prosperity, outside of the domain of tragedy; for to-day one can hear Molière and Beaumarchais as they should be.

The success of Mlle. Patti has not yet, indeed, reached such a degree of tyranny. When she played Zerlina recently, the entire audience remained for the final catastrophe, although there was no promise of anything extraordinary. Nevertheless, the tendency to this exclusiveness is too marked, and there is danger of the worst results. Fracchini does not sing with the same care and confidence as at his debut; the relative injustice of the multitude has disheartened and chilled him. The other singers, excepting the young Vitali, who doubts nothing, have ceased to do their best, for it has no chance with the public indifference toward them. The best operas are those which the favorite does them the honor to sing, whatever their actual merits, and so talents that might be made to illuminate the genius of the masters are employed to confound them.

A single artist cannot long make good the qualities of a troupe, for the dramatic art does not consist in monologue; and the repertory is too comprehensive to be permanently eclipsed. Let us add, that upon this point, as upon others, the pure interests of art are precisely in accordance with the requirement of theatrical economy. Just in proportion as the receipts on the evenings when the favorite sings are increased, in the same proportion the other nights show a falling off. Could she perform every night there would be a gain certainly, if we could count on the rage for her continuing. Could she play half the nights, the balance would still be preserved; but when she performs only one evening in three, the balance is against us. Besides, the theatre is so much more open to chance disasters. A fortnight's illness will produce an almost irreparable difference; and any break in the engagement carries disaster in its train. The name alone of the Théâtre-Italien, with its long history of glorious achievements, is a host upon which dependence can always be made; but such a phenomenon as we are now considering may deprive it of even that prestige.

"What's to be done?" may be asked. There seem to us but two things. We must do away with the tyrannical supremacy of a single favorite, and frown upon an administration like the present, which in every way contrives to advance the separate interest in the one before all others, even by doing it in such little particulars as numbering the successive performances of Mlle. Patti, and allowing the others to pass unregistered, as if unworthy the public regard. In the second place, it is the feeblest part of the chain that needs the most guarding against, that is to say, we ought to bestow the most care where it is most needed, upon the off-nights, in purifying our choice of plays for those evenings, in fitting to them the most proper performers, and in securing for the post of director and chiefs of orchestra such leaders as we were wont to have formerly. Fracchini is an excellent singer, but, from being able to direct affairs, he has need himself of being animated, incited. We need in such a post the authority of character and reputation,—a Ronconi, for example,—and we may then hope to see some life imparted to our languishing attempts. In fine, it is the bounden duty of such a director to prevent the company and the plays becoming of less interest to the public than the favorite which may be uppermost. It is this watchfulness which has made the Comédie-Française what it is. It has actors of the first merit, together with the fit government of them. They are not allowed to become individually too predominant, but rather study to make their importance a reflected one, from their necessity to their company. The result is an organization which is superior to accidents and exigencies, whose ordinary routine is worth more than any spasmodic phenomenon,—a prosperity which is certain and constant, and laughs at dependence on a fashion of the hour. Yes, Beaumarchais and Molière exercise as much or more influence upon the public than the new pieces, but that does not prevent Le Fils de Giboyer and Maitre Guérin from being a great success, nor deprive Provost, Geoffroy, Regnier, Got, and Bressant of the fame of being the best comedians of their time. When a theatre is organized in this way, its fortune is assured, and it can trust itself.

The Théâtre-Italien could enjoy such a fortune if it pleased. It did enjoy it, at a period not long since. I know it is easier to call up the remembrance of that golden age than to bring about its return: and that the management of the Italian opera is more troublesome and hazardous now than in the time of Severini, Robert, and Vatel. With all the gold in the world, and drawing upon all the Italian troupes scattered over Europe and America, we could not now find the equal of those performers that created Les Puritains at Paris, namely, Rubini, Lablache, Tamburini, and Grisi;—no, nor the duet of Otello as it was sung in 1821 by Garcia and Pasta. Now, these artists, with all their extraordinary talents, contented themselves with more modest appointments than ours, and did double the work. The business went on marvellously with a single tenor or two, a single bass, a single barytone, two or three primadonnas,—each performer singing as happened the comic and pathetic. Lablache, of himself, in that deep chest of his, harbored the greatest variety of tones. Rubini sang Edgardo and Almaviva equally well. To-day we must have at least two troupes,—one for the spianato and the melodrama, the other for the comic repertory. The company now at the Italian house is three times as large as it was twenty years ago, and yet the parts do not seem always well filled.

Our two conditions, then, are, to have the list of pieces varied regularly, and to have the company homogeneous and stable. They can do this, for they have the material, and only need the fit word to command success. If it should be proved that without the subsidy of the government it cannot sustain itself, it should by all means have that restored to it. We will not admit the idea that Paris should be deprived of the Italian stage, when all other capitals, great and small, enjoy it. It would be still worse to see it degenerate among us, with a precarious existence; for it has honorable traditions to be sustained, and the national pride is not a little interested in them.

The Grand Opera belongs to the official world and the more fixed portions of the highest of Parisian society. The Italian house is rather the attraction of the cosmopolites, and if it be true that Paris is more than the nation's capital, it is incumbent on us to sustain it.

The New Steinway Music Hall.

The new Music Hall erected by Messrs. Steinway & Sons has been built in connection with, and immediately in rear of, their Marble Warerooms, Nos. 71 and 73 East Fourteenth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, having a frontage on Fourteenth Street of 50 feet, extending clear through the block to Fifteenth Street, where the building has a frontage of 100 feet.

The entire first floor of the building, from Fourteenth to Fifteenth Streets, is devoted exclusively to the Pianoforte Warerooms of Messrs. Steinway & Sons, being the most extensive, elegant and suitable Salesrooms in existence.

The main entrance, alike to these Warerooms and the grand Music Hall, is through the elegant marble portico on Fourteenth Street, which has a width of 17 feet, and is supported by four Corinthian columns, forming a handsome vestibule, the floor of which is of Italian marble tile, of Mosaic pattern, and lighted by an elegant prismatic lantern. Here the Ticket-office is located. From this vestibule on the ground floor two separate stairways, each seven feet wide, lead directly to the ground floor of the Hall proper, into a spacious vestibule forty-two feet in height from the floor to the roof, which is lighted and ventilated with the perfection of modern art. From this vestibule two grand entrances lead into the main Hall, and two separate stairways conduct to the two balconies, each being independent of the other.

The dimensions of the Steinway Hall are: length, 123 feet; width, 75 feet; height from floor to ceiling, 42 feet. Connecting with the main Hall, on the same level of the floor, directly opposite the stage, is a large room, 25 feet wide and 84 feet long, running to the front wall on Fourteenth Street, which can be opened into or shut off from the main Hall, at pleasure, through the medium of sliding partition-doors, affording room for 400 persons.

The entire building, from foundation to roof, has been erected in a manner so thoroughly substantial that it is regarded as a model structure. The foundations are the solid bed of rock which crops out between Irving Place, across Union Square, to Fifth Avenue. The basement walls of the building are of solid granite, 3 feet in thickness; thence to the roof the brick walls are 2 feet 8 inches thick, with heavy external supporting buttresses. The whole of the walls, from foundation to roof, are laid in solid cement. In addition to the unusual strength of the exterior walls, the main floor of the Hall is carried by two supporting walls beneath it, extending directly from the foundation. The timber is all of extra size and strength, the floor has been thoroughly seasoned by filling the spaces between the beams with non-conducting matter, thereby rendering the Hall impervious to the objectionable features of excessive vibration and elasticity of floor.

The front on Fifteenth Street is built of the finest Philadelphia front brick, with brown-stone trimmings, and finely-ornamented pillars and caps. There are two balconies (one above the other) at the end of the Hall towards Fourteenth Street, which extend on either side of the room about one-third of its length only.

The platform and stage is placed at the Fifteenth Street end of the Hall, and extends entirely across it. Connecting with the Hall and stage on the westerly side there is an additional building on Fifteenth Street, containing four elegant artists' dressing-rooms, the upper story being devoted to the bellows, wind-chests, and some of the heavy work of the organ, which at present is located in the north-western corner of the Hall, while the grand organ, when finished, will occupy the entire space from sidewalk to sidewalk.

The organ used for present purposes has been purchased from St. Thomas Church, and had 32 stops. It has been thoroughly remodeled by its original builders, Messrs. Hall & Labaugh, who have added to it 8 new registers.

The seating capacity of the Hall is as follows: 1,300 seats on the main floor, 800 seats on the two balconies, and 400 seats in the extension room—in all, 2,500 seats; all being permanently-fixed iron-framed arm-chairs, cushioned with ruby leather—the seats being more roomy and more comfortable than in any other public building in the country. There is ample standing-room for five hundred additional persons, if needed. The aisles are unusually wide, as are also the spaces between the rows of seats. The means of ingress and egress are of the most capacious character, there being two additional exit doors, each seven feet wide, on either side of the stage, leading directly into Fifteenth Street. The doors on both Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets all open outwards, allowing the Hall to be cleared by its numerous stairways in three minutes, if necessary.

No attempt at frescoing the Hall can of course be made until next Summer, when it will be decorated in the highest style of art; meanwhile the walls are hard-finished, with a pearl tint, the ceiling being pure white. The Hall is heated entirely by steam, on the most approved principles, admitting of the most perfect regulation of temperature. The steam generator is placed in an outside building some distance from the Hall.

The chief points of excellence in the new Steinway Hall, independent of its magnificent proportions and acoustic properties, are its perfect ventilation and illumination, through the medium of two of De Fries' Patent Sunlights, imported from London at a vast expense. These Sunlights—the merits of which have been fully tested in a large number of public buildings in England—light the Hall from the ceiling, illuminating the room perfectly by a brilliant flood of light, which is softened and rendered highly agreeable to the eye by rows of crystal prisms encircling the reflectors.

LEIPZIG. Herr Abert's opera of Astorga has been produced here under the direction of the composer. The public were greatly pleased, but the critics do not consider the work deserving of the reputation which preceded it.

Music Abroad.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE. These concerts are being carried on with rather an increase than a diminution of the healthy spirit to which they owe their well-earned fame and position. Six have been given already; and in the course of the first five, among other things, have been produced—the fourth Symphony and the Eroica (No. 3) of Beethoven; the Italian Symphony of Mendelssohn; the second Symphony (in C) of Schumann (which gains on every hearing); and the Symphony in C major ("Jupiter") of Mozart. In the way of overtures we have had—the Ruy Blas, the Hebrides, and the Meeresschloß of Mendelssohn; the Zauberflöte of Mozart; the Der Freischütz and Abu Hassan of Weber; the Sapphire Necklace of Mr. Arthur Sullivan; and the Alfonse und Estrelle (played sometimes under the name of Rosamunde) of Schubert. The Grand Fantasia, Op. 15, of Schubert, for piano and orchestra (Herr Fritz Hartvigson, pianist), Paganini's first concerto (violin, Herr Wilhelmj), and last, not least, Professor Sterndale Bennett's third Pianoforte Concerto (pianist, Mme. Arabella Goddard), have also been given; together with a selection from Meyerbeer's music to Struensee, and a "Grand" (very grand) Suite de Valse, entitled "Reveillez-vous," due to the pen of M. Gounod—some, like the concerto of Professor Bennett, for the first time at the Crystal Palace. A retrospective catalogue of the vocal music at these five concerts would needlessly fill up space; but enough has been adduced to show that the same excellent principle which governs the Monday Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall governs the Saturday Winter Concerts at the Crystal Palace.

The programme of Saturday afternoon (the sixth concert) was of uncommon interest. One of the best of Haydn's twelve grand symphonies, composed for the Subscription Concerts in London, directed by the violinists Salomon and Cramer, was introduced for the first time at the Crystal Palace. The symphony in C minor, the ninth of the Salomon set, contains an air, with variations, which only Haydn could have written; a minuet, with a trio for violoncello solo (well played by Mr. Reed), with which the late Robert Lindley, from time to time, used to delight two generations of our forefathers; a nobly constructed first allegro, and a finale that might have been written by Mozart, the influence of whose great symphony in D, and still greater symphony in C (the so-called Jupiter—his last) is felt all through. Amateurs predisposed to twist Mozart with his early obligations to Haydn should remember that whatever obligations Mozart incurred were paid back by him with interest. Haydn's first visit to London, where he composed the twelve symphonies for Salomon, was in 1790, the year before Mozart's death; and Mozart's last three great symphonies (in E flat, G minor, and C major) were written from June to August, 1788. What a deep impression they must have made upon Haydn—his predecessor, contemporary, and survivor, who was sixty years old when Mozart died, at thirty-six—appears in all the later symphonies of the former, and in none more emphatically than in the ninth of the Salomon set—the one performed so admirably and received so warmly at the Crystal Palace concert on Saturday. The audience would willingly have heard both the variations and the minuet twice; but, seeing that the programme was somewhat longer than usual, Mr. Manns was wise in not acceding to their wish. To the symphony succeeded Siebel's air, "Quando a te," from the first act of M. Gounod's Faust e Margherita, and the vigorous war song, "Honor and arms," from Handel's Samson. About these it is enough to say that they were well given—the former by Mme. Patey-Whytock, the latter by Mr. Patey.

The next instrumental performance was for several reasons the most interesting of the day. First, it introduced something wholly unknown in this country; secondly, the something unknown was by Franz Schubert, whose smallest effusions are now as eagerly looked after as his greatest were neglected in his life-time; thirdly, this unknown music is as truly beautiful as it is truly original; and lastly, the performance was as near perfection as any orchestral performance we can remember. The incidental pieces composed by Schubert for the drama of Rosamunde (in 1823, at Vienna) comprise two entr'actes, a romance for mezzo-soprano voice, three choruses, and ballet. The drama, from the luckless pen of the Baroness Holmine Chezy, the same who smothered Weber's genius in her Euryanthe, was only played two or three times, and the music of Schubert till very lately remained lost to the world. The orchestral score and parts, indeed, of four of the pieces are not to be found, having been mislaid, or probably lost, by those who at one time held possession of all that Schubert left, from whose indifferent guardianship Robert Schumann rescued the great symphony in C major, and other works were happily abstracted by worshippers of Schubert's genius. In obtaining what was to be obtained in its original shape, as the composer wrote it down, out of the music of Rosamunde, from the Vienna music publisher, Spina (now, we believe, possessor of all the MSS. of Schubert), those who direct the management of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts have done good service; and it is much to be regretted that only an instalment, instead of the whole, could be procured. For this instalment, however, we have reason to be thankful. It included an entr'acte in B minor, the romance for mezzo soprano voice, and an entr'acte in B flat major. The first entr'acte ("allegro molto moderato"), and by far the most important, is one of those magnificently gloomy inspirations with which Schubert, nearly always depressed when not subject to an exuberant flow of animal spirits, was so frequently visited. It is such a movement as we can fancy only one other composer imagining; but then Beethoven would have treated it in quite a different manner. The sudden transition from the minor to the major key near the close is one of the most extraordinary surprises in music. The entire movement is a masterpiece of sombre coloring; and though (on account of its gloom being scarcely once dispersed by a bit of sunshine) not devoid of a certain oppressiveness which at the conclusion leaves, as it were, a conflicting sense of relief and disappointment, the hearer feels that it might go on in the same strain ever so much longer and still hold the attention spell-bound. A sense of power is ever there, and a feeling that the master is bending you to his tone of mind with irresistible fascination. The other entr'acte (andantino) is of a wholly opposite character. Those acquainted with the charming pianoforte Impromptu in the same key (B flat major) will recognize a slight reminiscence in the opening bars; but all the rest is different. This entr'acte is one unbroken flow of tune—in a strain of gentle softness, of its kind unique—and arranged for the orchestra with consummate art. We can hardly recall an unpretending score more full of subtle and delicate touches. The performance of these remarkable entr'actes would alone have repaid a visit to the Crystal Palace. As Schumann said about a performance of the scherzo in Mendelssohn's A-minor symphony—"the instruments seemed to talk to each other;" and this, moreover, throughout in a beautifully managed undertone, as difficult to realize as it is delightful to listen to. Thus the entr'actes were heard with Schubert's own instrumentation. Not so the romance ("Dor Vollmond strahlt auf Bergeshöh'n"), the instrumental parts of which are unfortunately unobtainable. Mr. Manns, however, undertook the not very grateful responsibility of scoring the accompaniment for orchestra; and though we cannot but think it would have been discreeter, under the circumstances, had he used the pianoforte arrangement, we must in fairness compliment the zealous conductor on the good taste and extreme ability with which he has accomplished his task. The romance—a beautiful romance even for Schubert—was sung with such charming expression by Mlle. Enequist as to win a hearty and unanimous encore. The audience, too, would fain have heard the gentle second entr'acte once again; but this was not to be. On the whole, the impression made by Schubert's Rosamunde was as genuine as that created by any new music we remember at the Crystal Palace Concerts, where so much that is new, as well as so much that is good, is constantly brought forward.

After Schubert's music came "The Captive's Dream," the clever scena composed by Mr. Osborne for the recent Worcester-Festival, and given now as before by Mr. Cummings, with excellent effect; a somewhat labored duet of Schumann ("Ich bin dein Baum, o Gärtner"), sung by Madame and Mr. Patoy, with pianoforte accompaniment; a brilliant violin solo, on airs from Bellini's opera Il Pirata, composed and performed by Mr. H. Blagrove; and the cavatina from Lucia di Lammermoor ("Regnava nel silenzio"), assigned to the versatile Mlle. Enequist—one and all of which were favorably received. Then, after the customary five minutes' interval, Mendelssohn's ever welcome concert overture, Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt (Calm Sea and Happy Voyage), was played by the orchestra as we are disposed to think we never heard it played before by any orchestra. In an interesting note Mr. Manns calls this "the third of the four concert-overtures," whereas in reality it is the second, having been composed in 1828, two years before the Hebrides. True the author carefully recast it some years later; but it should be borne in mind that he also almost entirely re-wrote the Hebrides, the original version of which is in possession of Mr. Moscheles, while the autograph MS. of that which is now generally known belongs to Professor Sterndale Bennett.* There are very few published works by Mendelssohn that were not revised, in some cases (as, for example, the Walpurgisnacht) almost re-written, before they passed into the hands of the engraver. The Meeresstille was composed two years later than A Midsummer Night's Dream, and five years earlier than Melusine (Ouverture zum Märchen von der schönen Melusine), the last—and as Mendelssohn himself thought, the best—of the four concert overtures. The very fine performance of the Meeresstille brought the excellent concert of Saturday to an end.

A word is due to the directors of the Crystal Palace, in acknowledgment of the liberal spirit which has induced them to afford the conductor of their Saturday concerts that increase in the numerical strength of his orchestra, which alone was wanting to complete the efficiency of the performances. There are now thirty violins and ten violas, with sixteen violoncellos and basses. Of the competency of the wind instruments in the orchestra of Mr. Manns it would be superfluous to speak. Had there been any doubt about it the execution of Schubert's entr'actes on Saturday would effectually have set all doubts at rest.—Times, Nov. 12.

NORWICH FESTIVAL. The fifteenth Musical Festival at this place began on Monday evening, Oct. 20, with Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The Orchestra says:

The "Israel in Egypt" did not go well, and perhaps the only way to make it do so is to follow the example of the Yorkshiresmen, and deport the whole musical strength of Exeter Hall, by special train, to the locus in quo.

The performance of "Israel in Egypt" on Monday evening was given at reduced prices for the benefit of those lovers of grand music who cared not particularly for aristocratical influences and were glad to avail themselves of hearing this fine orchestra. The first grand concert came off on Tuesday evening. The instrumental pieces were the Overture to the "Ruler of the Spirits" by Weber; a portion of the Septet by Beethoven; his fine March from the "Ruins of Athens;" and Mr. Sullivan's new "Overture Fun-èbre," written on the death of his father. Of the solo music, Mr. Cummings sang a Cavatina of Mozart, and a very pretty Serenade by Féliçien David. Mr. Weiss gave The Pedlar's Song, by Mendelssohn, and Miss Edith Wynne, Benedict's pleasing romance, "My home in Cloudland." Mr. Santley appeared in an aria by Gounod. The foreign vocalists were Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Sinico, Mme. de Meric-Lablache, and Mme. Rudersdorff; Sig. Marini and M. Gassier.

The Tietjens interpreted the "Non mi dir" from Mozart's "Don Juan;" and the Sinico, the lively song of Aennchen from the "Der Freischütz." Sig. Marini was cruelly painstaking in an aria from Méhul's "Joseph;" and Signor Gassier as comic as usual in "Largo al factotum." The first act of the concert closed with a finale from Cherubini's opera of "Les deux Journées;" well written, and fully up to Cherubini's highest mark. The Duke of Edinburgh was present, and His Royal Highness was an object of more than ordinary curiosity and attention. The selections from the "Ruins of Athens," which closed the concert, may be ranked amongst the most interesting music that Beethoven ever put on paper.

The morning performance of Wednesday was in every respect a grand one, from the attendance of the Royal personages, and their triumphal procession into the Old City. It was truly a gorgeous scene, both inside and outside of the Hall. The music given was a small—a very small composition of Louis Spohr, written for drawing-room performances, at the request and cost of a Rev. C. Broadley; and this was followed by the "Naaman" of Costa. The Spohr anthem passed without interest and without notice, for the Royal Party had not yet arrived, and the audience was restless and excited.

Mr. Costa commenced the oratorio, but scarcely had the second chorus been announced, when the roar of the crowd outside and a medley of conflicting hands gave unmistakable token of the presence of the Royal visitors. The State Stalls, placed on a richly decorated dais, were located just in front of the orchestra, and after some little waiting, the excitement of the audience was gratified with the entrance of the Prince and Princess, the Queen of Denmark, the Duke of Edinburgh, and their suites. The applause was universal and was brought to a climax by a tremendous English cheer. England is loyal to the backbone, and the Norwich citizens and the Norfolk nobility and gentry are not behind even the Highlanders in warmth and enthusiasm. It is unnecessary to say a word of Mr. Costa's oratorio of "Naaman;"

* Presented to him by Mendelssohn.

Mr. Bartholomew is unquestionably a great poet, and Mr. Costa equally great as a musician; and there is an analysis of the Oratorio by Mr. William Davison, which tells everybody everything that poet and composer sympathetically imagined and triumphantly realized. Mr. Santley was the Prophet; Mme. Rudersdorff the Widow; Mlle. Drasdil, Tinna; and the Tietjens represented Adah. Mr. Sims Reeves, of course, appeared as Naaman, Mr. Cummings assisting. The principal vocalists were all up to their work, and the chorus had been well drilled. The band knew their parts by heart, and Mr. Costa's task was an easy one. The oratorio was well done, and even the composer, we trust, was satisfied with the result.

The concert of Wednesday evening, although well attended by the town's people proved not so attractive to the ticket holders for the patron's gallery. No doubt the Ball, graced by the Royal presence at Costessy Hall, had its attraction, and those who were not among the fortunate few invited would scarcely choose to proclaim the fact by attending the concert at St. Andrew's Hall. For some reason or other the "Midsummer Night" music was not performed, nor was the extract from the "Africaine." It was understood questions of copyright might take an ugly rise from the presentation of this music, and litigious proceedings were avoided by a wise abandonment of the music. The novelties of the evening were the Quartet by Randegger, and the Cloud of Shelley by George Osborne. The Sunrise of Randegger proved effective, as it was sure to do, written especially for its singers and in the school of which its composer is an efficient exponent. Cloudland in Shelley's brain, and pictured by Shelley's pen, is rather more than falls with Mr. Osborne's grasp, but his composition is fairly designed and the design realized by one who well knows what he is about. The popular favorites appeared in popular songs, and gained the usual encore, which consisted of the substitution of other, and, if possible, greater popularities.

The Thursday morning selection was attended by a full audience. The place could hold no more. The opening music, Handel's Passion, is not an oratorio, but it gives opportunity for great dramatic feeling. Handel's work is that of young Handel, evidencing feeling, German form, power, and love of display. Its performance formed a good foil to the cantata which followed.

Mr. Chorley's "Cecilia" is built on the old story—the old faith persecuting the new and burning its disciples. The lady, a Christian, marries a Pagan, who is converted by his bride. The one is beheaded, the other burnt. There is a wedding chorus, a hymeneal duet, the "Conversion," attended by a cohort of angels, the curse of the Pagan, the trial, the execution, the Funeral March, and the Apotheosis. These popular points are condensed into an essence, and Mr. Benedict has written for his vocalists—all splendid singers, and he has done so like an old soldier, with craft and effect. The piece was well executed and well received. Mr. Sims Reeves retired after the conclusion of this music, and the extracts from the "Creation" of Haydn followed, proving unusually attractive and interesting. Mr. Benedict was received both before and after the performance of his music in a way most gratifying to his feelings; in fact, it was a great ovation. Mr. Chorley ought to have been called. The Thursday Evening Concert consisted of the F Symphony, by Beethoven (No. 8), Selections from Verdi's "Ernani," the overture to "William Tell," by Rossini; the "Haunting Chorus," by Haydn, and the notable songs by Gounod, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Bellini, Mozart, Mercadante, Benedict, Macfarren, Sullivan, &c., &c. The programme was thoroughly popular. The "Messiah" of Handel followed on the Friday, and in the evening there was the usual Dress Ball.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. The ninth season commenced Nov. 5, at St. James's Hall, the room being well filled. The instrumental pieces were Haydn's quartet in G major, No. 1, Op. 76; violin solo, prelude and fugue in G minor, Bach; Beethoven's so called "Moonlight" sonata; variations on Mozart's air from the "Zauberflöte," "The Manly Heart," for piano and cello; and Mendelssohn's trio in E minor, for piano, violin, and cello. The executants were Herr Straus, Herr L. Ries, Mr. H. Blagrove, Signor Piatti, and Mme. Arabella Goddard. Mr. Santley was the vocalist, and sang Gounod's "The Valley," Haydn's "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone," and a song by Arthur Sullivan, "A weary lot is thine, fair maid." There was no fault to be found with the instrumental part of the concert. Haydn's quartet—the opening piece—was certainly the gem of the evening, and the audience appeared to enjoy it, although it received but very moderate applause. It was magnificently played. The fugue by Bach—whom the Times styles "the universal Leipzig cantor, Patriarch of the organ, and High Priest of the Protestant chorale," is very difficult, but was capitally got through; the parts being well distinguished, and marked with great steadiness and precision. It was greatly applauded, as it well deserved to be. Mme. Goddard's playing of the opening movement of the sonata in C-sharp minor was a most artistic performance, and merited more recognition than it received; in the following movements the audience warmed somewhat more, and at the end of the piece its fair interpreter received loud and continued applause. The puerile name given to this sonata is none of Beethoven's; and its absurd restrictiveness affords an apt instance of the impertinence of musical critics. Beethoven's variations on Mozart's air were, of course, all that could be desired in the hands of Mme. Goddard and Signor Piatti. Mendelssohn's magnificent trio was evidently above the comprehension of most of the audience. They sat it out, however, with exemplary patience, and were tolerably demonstrative at the end. Of the three vocal pieces we need but say, that Gounod's song was admirably sung, and that Sullivan's obtained an encore—the only encore of the evening.

The second of the Monday Popular Concerts presented the usual characteristics. Mme. Arabella Goddard was the pianist, and Miss Edmonds the vocalist. Mme. Goddard's performances were Dussek's "Invocation," and Mendelssohn's D major sonata for piano and violoncello, which she executed with Signor Piatti. The instrumental concerted pieces were Mozart's Divertimento in D major, M.M. Straus, L. Ries, H. Blagrove, Piatti, Standen, and C. Harper, and the quartet in the same key by Haydn (Op. 64), executed by the first four gentlemen named. Miss Edmonds sang "Maker of every star" from "Naaman," and Sullivan's Arabian Love-song.

Germany.

COLOGNE. A correspondent of the Orchestra writes from this city, under date Oct. 29, as follows:

Blessed peace has again spread her calm over Germany; people again seek after æsthetic enjoyment; and the musical season begins. The Gewandhaus in Leipzig opened its doors for the Thursday concerts on the 18th instant, two weeks later than usual, on account of the cholera. Berlin began on the 22nd October, with the first Sinfonie Soirée der königliche Capelle. In Frankfurt the first Museum-Concert took place on the 14th October. Vienna (where Berlioz has been invited to direct his new work, "La damnation de Faust," on the 18th November) is making great preparations; and all the other towns of musical Germany are beginning their concert season one after the other. Zur Gedenkfeyer der vaterländischen Helden, was dedicated the first grand concert given by our Concert-Gesellschaft, under the leadership of Ferdinand Hiller, on the 28th instant, in the magnificent old Gürzenich Saal. A bust of the King of Prussia crowned with a laurel wreath was placed on the platform; and the programme judiciously selected for the occasion, containing old and new compositions, was extremely interesting. No. 1. "Festklänge, Grosse Introduction," for orchestra, choir, and organ, composed for the Siegesfest in Berlin by H. Dorn. No. 2. Requiem in C minor for four voices, orchestra, and organ, by Cherubini. No. 3. The Sinfonia Eroica of Beethoven. Dorn's composition is made up of the choral: Nun danket Alle Gott, and the old triumphal march of Hohenfriedberg, composed on the occasion of the great victory carried by the Prussians under Frederick the Great against the Austrians and Saxons. It is a very insipid composition, without any genial touch, and it met with decided indifference on the part of the public. The Requiem of Cherubini, like that of Mozart, the Mass in B minor of Bach, and the Mass of Beethoven in D major, are works of magnitude which are often neglected, for church people find them too worldly for the church, and concert-goers think them too sacred for the concert room. The more thankful should we be to Hiller for having seized the opportunity of bringing out Cherubini's Requiem in a most admirable manner. The beautiful ensemble of the orchestra, chorus, and organ (nearly 500 performers), under his classic baton, produced a deep impression, and the crowded audience showed their satisfaction by enthusiastic applause. Cherubini's immortal oration was composed for the anniversary of Louis XVI.'s death, and it was performed for the first time on the 21st of January, 1816, in the church of St. Denis, in Paris.

The complete absence of solos in the first Gürzenich Concert was largely amended in the second one, which took place on the 6th instant. The first part commenced with an overture (new to Cologne) composed by Julius Tausch, music director in Düsseldorf, on the occasion of the last Rhenish Musical Festival. It is like so many others—a well-modulated and well-scored piece, void of original thoughts, and coquetting principally with Schumann's and Mendelssohn's music. The second number of the programme, was an air from "Scipione," by J. Ch. Bach, sung by Mme. Rudersdorff from London. I am extremely sorry to state that the composition, as well as the execution of it, produced a very poor impression upon the audience. This air, from the opera "La Clémence di Scipione," composed in 1770, is a monotonous and difficult kind of solfeggio for trumpet, requiring a long breath, and a voice of fresh quality and great compass, no longer at Mme. Rudersdorff's command. Johann Christian Bach, a son of Sebastian the great, and pupil of his elder brother, Philip Emanuel, was born in Leipzig in 1735. In 1754 he was engaged as first organist at the Duomo of Milan. In 1759 he went to London as chef d'orchestre, and there he settled, and died in 1782, having obtained great popularity, principally among the English fair sex. His music is chiefly calculated for effect, and rarely possesses any genuine inspiration. When Johann Christian was asked why he did not follow the same path in music as his brother Emanuel, he used to answer, "Emanuel lives to compose, and I compose to live."

A fantasia for the violoncello upon Russian tunes, composed and capitally delivered by Herr Alex. Schmit, Professor at the Conservatorie of Cologne, was the third number of the programme, which met with genuine success and great applause. This composition, like all fantasies, belongs to the category of light music, but the themes being judiciously arranged, forming a charming andante and an effective allegro elegantly scored, produced a very pleasing impression after Bach's unhappy air. The fourth number of the programme afforded a splendid revanche to Mme. Rudersdorff. She sang two canzonette of Haydn, the first with German, the second with English words, in a very charming manner, and was deservedly applauded. These two gems of Haydn, are exceedingly becoming to the eminent artist. The adagio and finale from the Concerto in B minor, by G. H. Hummel, introduced a new acquaintance to the public of Cologne. Mrs. Johnson-Graever, pianist of the Queen of Holland, comes from Paris with an American reputation. This lady, a Dutchwoman, the wife of an Englishman, is undoubtedly an artist of talent, but she ought not to play Hummel's music, which demands the ne plus ultra of strength and technical skill. The second part of the programme was filled up by the Symphony in D minor, by R. Schumann (one of his best), capitally performed by the excellent orchestra under the leadership of F. Hiller.

LEIPZIG.—The first Gewandhaus Concert for the season took place on the 18th October, when the following compositions were performed: Overture to Les Abencerages, Cherubini, Air, "Auf starkem Fittig," from The Creation, Haydn; Violin Concerto, No. 9, D minor, Spohr; Recitative and aria from Faust; A major Symphony, Beethoven. The soloists were Madame Ullrich-Bohn, from the Mannheim Theatre, and Herr Hermann Brandt, from Hamburg. The following works constituted the programme at the second Gewandhaus Concert: Symphony, G major, Haydn; Genoveva Overture, Schumann; and "Festouvertüre," Volkmann. Mme. Emilie Wagner, from Carlsruhe, sang: "Ach, nur einmal noch im Leben," from Mozart's Titus. "Nachtstück," Franz Schubert, and "Ich wandle nicht," Schumann. Herr Joseph Derffel, Imperial Pianist, from St. Petersburg, played Beethoven's E-flat major Concerto, and two compositions of his own: a "Fantasiestück" and a "Rondo gracioso."

The third Gewandhaus Concert took place Nov. 1st with the following programme:—Handel's G minor concerto for stringed instruments, two violins and violoncellos obligato, (David, Haubold, and Hegar); two ariettas from Handel's "Susannah" (Frl. Emilie Wagner from Carlsruhe); Sonata by F. W. Rust (1795) for pianoforte and violin (David and Reinecke); Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer;" and the symphony in A minor.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW HAVEN, Nov. 28.—This city affords but little employment to a critic's pen, and our own, as a mere chronicler of musical events, has grown rusty with disuse; but one inclined to lament the vast difference between that which is, and that which might and should be, in art, finds plenty of occupation here as elsewhere.

Without entertaining any Quixotic ideas of infusing the soul of music into the masses, by the mere process of galvanizing the taste, we yet believe that every place which can assume the dignity of a corporate organization, and the title of a city, ought to comprise within its limits the means and the enterprise requisite to furnish an orchestra; one which, if small, can at least give the people something in the shape of classical or chamber soirées. It is argued that these would not be well attended, but the experiment has not yet, we believe, been tried here. We have an orchestra, it is true; and one which can perform compositions of Beethoven and Mozart, but one which is silent for the most part, or only heard when called upon to fill the pauses of a lecture at the Music Hall.

There has been the usual,—perhaps an unusual number of virtuoso concerts this season,—including three given by the Bateman troupe, (with excellent programmes, by the way), and there is talk of Camilla Urso for the future; but these facts are owing to the enterprise of the managers, rather than to any musical spirit which the place affords. The people, however, show their good will by coming out in large numbers, filling the Music Hall to its utmost capacity, and encoring the artists heartily at the most incongruous times.

But the main event of the season is the advent of a new artiste, whom New Haven can claim for her own, and who is likely, at some future day, to gain more than a merely local reputation.

Five years ago, Miss MARIE A. GILBERT, whose performance upon the pianoforte then attracted some attention, left this city and entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig, where she has passed the intervening time, and having graduated, has returned to New Haven to begin her professional career. She gave her first concert on Thursday evening the 22nd inst., at the Music Hall, being assisted by Mrs. H. M. Smith of Boston, and supported by an orchestra from the Philharmonic Society, of New York. The programme included the following pieces:

Piano Concerto. F-sharp minor, op. 69.....F. Hiller.
Caprice Brilliant, B minor, op. 23.....Mendelssohn.
Polo-Galop Chromatique.....Liszt.

Together with many excellent vocal and orchestral selections.

It will be seen, from the foregoing, that Miss Gilbert aims above popularity, and that she will suffer no motives of policy to interfere with her sense of the artistic. For this, as well as for her courage in making this branch of music her profession, she cannot be too highly commended,—but, on the other hand, she has no claim to be judged by any other standard than that by which every artist must sooner or later be "put to the touch."

Therefore, we must pronounce Miss Gilbert's rendering of the F-sharp minor Concerto, a failure. Whether her error lay in selecting so difficult a piece for her first public performance, or whether her failure resulted from the nervousness attendant upon such an occasion, we are unable to state; but the latter supposition gains ground, from the fact that in playing the Capriccio, she displayed the same faults, (an undue hurrying up of the time, and the omission of notes—even whole measures) which marred the effect of the Concerto.

Miss Gilbert has however, we think, no reason to be discouraged, for her playing evinces marks of long and severe application, and with more study, and a few years of public experience, she will, we trust, rank with the best of our pianists.

We should not forget to state that the most artistic performance of the evening was the rendering, by Mrs. Smith, of the Swiss Echo Song, which seemed well adapted to the lady's voice and style.

MERCURIUS.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—The second Symphony Soirée of Mr. THOMAS was one of the finest concerts ever given in New York, perhaps the best as regards the works which formed the programme,—for there were Mozart's "Figaro" Overture, Schumann's pianoforte Concerto, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony entire.

The ever fresh overture was played by an excellent orchestra of 80 performers, with uncommon fire and precision. The effect was admirable, and set the audience at once in good humor. Perhaps no better opening could have been found. We have never heard Mr. MILLS play the Schumann Concerto more finely than on this occasion; the great work received due attention on all sides, the orchestra, as well as the soloist, playing with taste, discretion and finish. This composition also was enthusiastically received by the public.

If we consider how many elements are required to bring worthily before the public such a creation as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—a work in which the great master has embodied the deepest feelings, the holiest aspirations, the richest experiences of his ever inspired artist soul,—we must tender credit to Mr. Thomas for the courage with which he undertook and executed such a task. Taken on the whole, Mr. Thomas gave us the grand work in a very satisfactory manner; the least successful performance was the singing of the amateur solo quartet, although they certainly did their best; and the chorus and orchestra sang and played as if they enjoyed and appreciated their fine task. From movement to movement the audience was carried with spirit and fire; it seemed as though the genius that overflows this immense composition had inspired audience and performers with its own mighty enchantment; passages were listened to in silence, and with attentive faces, as though all sought to inwardly comprehend and feel the immortal tone-poem. And yet how many among the audience were capable of really comprehending the work they had just heard? How many knew that the singer of Joy had felt but little of earthly happiness? Knew of his struggles with his own sad destiny, with the misconception of his fellow men? How many felt, amid the tones that floated around them, the shadows of sorrow that darkened the soul of Beethoven, while he wrote this wonderful "Hymn to Joy!" Still, the greater part of the audience seemed deeply moved by the work; an evident feeling of elevation and enthusiasm appeared to reign throughout the large assemblage.

In the name of the highest interests of art, Mr. Thomas deserves our thanks for bringing out this Symphony; with energy and industry he overcame the impediments that lie in the way of such a performance, and the call he received at the end of the evening, was certainly only a well-merited recognition.

First Symphony Concert.

THE HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION seems not yet to have overcome the old grudge of the clerk of the weather, which it incurred last winter, when all but the last two of its concerts fell on stormy days. The first snow storm of the winter ushered in the second series on Friday, Nov. 23. But in spite of that, the Music Hall looked warm and genial and—light, we were about to say—but that would be only half true, for the musicians' eyes were sorely tried by want of light; the directors of the Hall must see to it. The audience was very large, over thirteen hundred people, and of the very best in character. The orchestra, with but few changes in its personnel, numbered 51 performers; to-wit: 10 first violins, 8 second, 6 tenors, 3 violoncelli (unfortunately too few!), 6 double basses; the usual pair of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons; 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, and drums. Sharp upon the hour Mr. CARL ZERRAHN raised his baton, and the first Overture began. The habit of promptness must be established, and we think those who suffered and caused others to suffer, in being caught tardy by this first enforcement of the rule, will take care to be in their seats in season next time. This was the programme:

Overture to "Anacreon,".....Cherubini.
Pianoforte Concerto, in A minor, (Op. 54).....Schumann.
Allegro Affettuoso—Intermezzo and Finale.

Otto Dresel.

Symphony, in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven.

Pianoforte Solos:

a. Weber's "Slumber Song," transcribed by.....Liszt.

b. Canon.....Schumann.

c. Rondo.....Chopin.

Otto Dresel.

Overture: "Leonora," No. 8.....Beethoven.

Cherubini's Overture, of which the first taste proved so pleasant last year, did not disappoint. It opens, to be sure, with a succession of chords which sound old-fashioned, common-place and formal, followed by a melodic phrase passed round with slight variation from flute to oboe, to clarinet, bassoon, 'cello, simple almost to seeming childlike, but delicate and exciting a mild expectation, which is more than gratified when the Allegro theme sets in. This begins pianissimo, gradually growing in force, and developing with the logic of true inspiration, till you are quite possessed and carried away by its fine, lifesome, and yet temperate and wholesome fervor. We do not know what events, real or fancied, in the life of the ever youthful old Greek poet are treated in the opera, or whether the Overture is made up of motives from the opera; but to us this music suggests the true Anacreontic temperament, the cheerful, healthy, harmonious all-aliveness and clearness of every sense and faculty, with which the poet could so well sing the keen delight of living. The "winy violinity" (so to speak) which foams up so clear and sparkling, the emulous strings kindling each other up to a harmonious furor, is glorious and inexhaustible. It was finely rendered, bating a little crudeness and fault of true pitch in an instrument or two in that formal introduction.

The Schumann Concerto had never been played here before with orchestra, until a few months since in the Parepa concerts, when Mr. Mills played one half of it one evening and the remainder the next. Mr. Dresel had played it a year or two ago in his Chamber Concerts, with the orchestral parts arranged for a second piano. It is one of the best of Schumann's larger works in every sense, and was written at about the period of his noblest Symphonies. From beginning to end it is instinct with poetic beauty, with deep and delicate feeling,—a truly original, imaginative, fine creation. All its little wayside beauties spring up naturally and as by inward logical necessity in the development of the main thought. Each phrase and figure, each chord, each modulation, each new accessory thought, each change of rhythm, comes as with the certainty of fate, as if it could not come otherwise; there is something of the Beethoven unity and certainty in that. Indeed, next to the three best by Beethoven, we can think of no piano Concerto that has interested us so much. It is far from being a mere exhibition piece for the single instrument; the piano becomes a living member of the orchestra, as in a Symphony; prominent as it is, of course, the other instruments have each somewhat to say, some illustration to contribute, which is equally indispensable to the symmetry and completeness of the whole.

And Mr. DRESEL was the man of all others to play the piano part. The fine poetic accent, the nice shading or lifting into light of note or phrase in due degree, the unmistakeable point with which the rich, peculiar Schumann chords were struck out and each made to reveal all its beauty, the just subordination of the single moments to the general movement of the whole, felt in the sure and easy mastery of that changeful play of rhythm with which the work abounds; the unceasing reference to the orchestra and due regard to other parties in the conversation, all showed how truly the interpreter entered into the spirit of the composition, how perfectly he understood it and how deeply he felt it. These are qualities in a pianist, compared with which no degree of virtuosity, of mere technique, however marvellous, can claim more than secondary consideration. And these are qualities in which Mr. Dresel is without a superior, if an equal, among artists in this country. His technical mastery of the instrument also is remarkable, indeed masterly, though there may be other pairs of hands of more machine-like certainty and strength than his. It is in the very nature of these fine artistic temperaments that their possession of their faculties is sensitively dependent upon moods and circumstances; subjective conditions limit, sometimes paralyze the utterance of a deep-souled poet, where a glib and shallow person never fails to do full justice to himself. Beethoven, before he became deaf, was doubtless a remarkable pianist, at least for his time; but doubtless too he was quite incapable of such execution as scores of uninteresting "finger knights" of our day. On this occasion, however, Mr. Dresel's higher artist powers were seconded by happy self-possession, and his rendering of the Concerto was as admirable technically as it was in spirit and intelligence. Throughout it was played with all possible precision and clearness. The only deduction from a perfectly satisfactory impression of it, was on the score of mere loudness, now and then a passage not being fairly heard in all parts of a hall of course too large for the best effects of a piano-forte; we have some other, younger pianists (to whom we by no means deny the higher qualities) who have this particular advantage over him. He was fortunate, too, in the instrument on which he played, one of the last Chickering Grands; tones of so much weight and volume, with so much sweet, essential music in them, we have not heard elsewhere. Our orchestra and their conductor must also be complimented on the precision and delicacy with which the exceedingly difficult accompaniment was given; we have never known them to play more carefully, more as if heart and mind were in the work; it was faithful artistic coöperation.

The Seventh Symphony, immortal favorite, was never more inspiring. It held the whole audience spell-bound to the end. We think it never went so well before in Boston, unless perhaps in one of those great Festivals when the orchestra was doubled in numbers; and that advantage was perhaps more than offset this time by more careful rehearsal, by the sympathetic influence of so musical an audience and by the spirit that pervades these concerts. This splendid Symphony, this glorious apotheosis of Joy, as clearly so as the ninth Symphony with its Schiller chorus, was the grand feature of the concert, one of those masterworks of genius which, when so brought home to us, makes us feel that life is indeed divine.

Mr. Dresel's little piano solos were exquisitely rendered and enjoyed. If either of the three could have been spared, it was perhaps the "Slumber Song," as having too much of the salon air about it, although it is singularly charming and poetic. The little "Canon" by Schumann, so crisp and clear and strong, was a most happy selection, and the modulation by which he bridged the passage to the Chopin Rondo, op. 16, (recalling for a moment, if we mistake not, the main theme of the Schumann Concerto, which has affinity with the introduction of the Rondo) was very cleverly devised.—Of the "Leonore" Overture, as of the Symphony, we may say that it was never better performed here, and it is an equally great creation in its way;—both of them too familiar to require description.

The second concert, which occurred yesterday, will be noticed in our next. It had for programme: Schumann's second Symphony (in C); his Overture to "Genoveva;" Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture; Henselt's piano Concerto in F minor, and the Fantasia-Impromptu, op. 66, of Chopin, played by Mr. Carlyle Petersilea.

Handel and Haydn Society.

The first Oratorio of the season, following close upon the first Symphony Concert, fairly opened the musical season with due dignity. (It might almost justify the use of the word "inaugurated," if that big word had not been wasted upon every small occasion). Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was performed on Sunday evening, Nov. 25. We could not wish for a nobler beginning. The impression which this masterly, devout, sublimely beautiful Oratorio made last year, when it was first heard here fairly and fully brought out, was this time more than realized again. The Music Hall was completely full, and there was no flagging of interest from the beginning to the end. The performance as a whole was one of the best successes yet recorded in the history of the old Society, which lately seems to have received an infusion of new youth and life. The choruses were all well sung, both the grand ones and the sweet and graceful ones, both the plain chorales and the fugued and intricate pieces of polyphonic writing. A marked improvement both in the balance of the parts, and in the average quality of voices in all parts, particularly in the tenors, became a common theme of conversation and of public critical recognition. Then too, the rich and graphic instrumentation, than which nothing more masterly and splendid can be found in Oratorio, was brightened up and strengthened greatly by employing the full orchestra of the Symphony Concerts. Such liberal outlay is the true economy; it helps, nay it compels the public to feel what this great music is, and guarantees the greater and the constant audience; while whatever increases the frequency of these two kinds of occupation for our musicians, in so far strengthens their artistic morale and keeps them free for nobler work. The Organ also added grand support in the great choruses, judiciously and skilfully used, as it always is, by Mr. LANG. Mr. Conductor ZERRAUN was fully master of the situation, and all told of the vigilance and patience with which he had watched the whole thing through the labors of rehearsal.

The solo work was on the whole very creditably done without resorting to great names. The singers, with the exception of Mr. GEORGE SIMPSON, who was suddenly called in to supply the place of Mr. JAMES WHITNEY, confined by severe illness, were of our own people. Miss HOUSTON gave the soprano recitatives and airs in good, firm voice, and with true feeling and expression, particularly the lovely Arioso: "I will sing of thy great mercies." Miss KATE RAMETTI, a debutante, daughter of our well-known flutist, sang the one contralto recitative and air: "But the Lord is mindful," and made an excellent impression by the power and richness of her voice, her simple, tasteful rendering of the music, and her modest manner. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY had to sustain the chief weight of the solo music in the character of Paul. His large and noble voice, especially in the deeper tones—a little dry in the upper—was well managed and gave dignity and effect to the impressive music. The tenor was at fault sometimes in reading, as well as weak and superficial in style; but the manner in which he sang "Be thou faithful unto death" proved that he had it in him, with due study, to do justice to such music.—We hope the winter will not pass without another performance of "St. Paul."

PARLOR OPERA.—The second trial of this new experiment was even more successful than the first; at least it proved more of the ability of our singers to make operas presentable in this simple, unpretending way. Lucia di Lammermoor seemed to us, we confess, an unpromising announcement; it was so serious and so difficult an opera, and, besides, so hacknied that one would have thought only the fullest means and rarest talents could have made it interesting. But we were agreeably disappointed on Thursday evening, Nov. 22. The music was all sung quite effectively by Miss RIDDELL (Lucia), whose voice is pleasant save when the highest tones are forced; Mr. JOHN FARLEY, excellent as Edgar-do; Dr. GUILMETTE, as Col. Ashton; and M. W. WHITNEY, who was especially commendable in the part of the Priest. The smaller parts of Alice and Arturo did not suffer in the hands of Mrs. HENRY and Mr. ALLEN A. BROWN. A nicely organized male chorus was quite effective in the betrothal scene, and we only wondered that the usual opening chorus was omitted. The Sextet was worthy of a trained Italian Opera troupe. The little orchestra played very nicely and not so overpoweringly as before; the florid clarinet obligato prelude to Lucia's first entrance was beautifully played by the veteran JAMES KENDALL.

Don Pasquale was repeated as a Saturday Matinée, with Mr. Farley as tenor, and relished heartily by a large audience. For the third night, Thursday of this week, Lucia again.

BATEMAN CONCERTS.—The two concerts given by this company last Sunday and Monday evenings—a hasty re-visit on their way westward—were highly appreciated by large audiences. In Sunday's "sacred" concert, Mme PAREPA sang "So shall the lute" from Judas Macabæus in her most admirable manner, and Gounod's Ave Maria (superimposed upon Bach's 1st. Prelude), with violin, piano and organ accompaniment, which very effective combination still gives general delight. Sig. FORTUNA, with fresh supply of voice apparently, sung Stradella's "Pietà, Signore," in a most chaste, artistic, finished style. BRIGNOLI's "sacred" airs were a sentimental Romanza by Alary and an Ave Maria by Mercadante, which of course he sang very sweetly, making the most of those three or four splendid high chest tones; and the comical FERRANTI (he did not look as if he had ever thought of his sins before) gave a fair rendering of Pro Peccatis. The Prayer from Moses united the four voices very effectively. CARL ROSA played Bach's Chaconne, as written, without any accompaniment, and never played so finely; the style was large and broad, approaching that of Joachim, only sometimes in his eager mastery he bore a little too hard on the strings, forcing the tone somewhat. This is a danger to be carefully avoided, a danger springing from the young artist's pure, intense enthusiasm. In the first and second movements from Schumann's Sonata in A, with MILLS, his tone was beautiful and delicate as the lovely music required. Mr. MILLS played finely in the Sonata, and with amazing brilliancy in his other "sacred" piece, Liszt's Fantasia on the "Wedding March," &c. There was no orchestra; but Mr. WILLCOX opened and ended the concert on the Organ, and accompanied the voice with consummate skill and taste.

Monday's programme was altogether miscellaneous. The best features were PAREPA's beautiful rendering of Mozart's Non mi dir, ROSA's performance of an Adagio by Spohr, and MILLS's repetition of the "Wedding March" Fantasia. The humorous things from Rossini were of course palatable.

NEXT IN ORDER. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, now in their 18th Season, begin their annual series of four classical Chamber Concerts next Tuesday evening, at Chickering's Hall (which hall, we are happy to say, has been furnished with new means of ventilation and more agreeable lighting). There will be nothing now to interfere with keen enjoyment of the Quartets, &c. The Club will play a Quartet by Haydn, always fresh, and Mozart's finest Quintet, that in G minor, which we have not heard for several years. Mr. PETERSILEA will play in a Trio by Henselt and a Toccata by Schumann; and Mr. SCHULTZE will play a "Legend" by Wieniaswky. This announcement comes most welcome, and we hope to see all the true listeners there.

Mr. ERNST PERABO's first Matinée is fixed for next Thursday, Dec. 13, when he will play Schubert's Sonata in E flat, op. 122, a Suite in D minor by Handel, and Beethoven's Sonata Duo in A, with WULF FRIES, we presume. There will be singing also.

Mr. DAUM's "Beethoven Matinéés" begin this month, but we have not learned the date.

The fourth "Parlor Opera" comes on the 20th. "The Bohemian Girl" will be played. Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger," owing to non-arrival of the orchestral parts, is reserved for a second series.

The third Symphony Concert (Friday, Dec. 21), offers the Mozart Symphony in E flat and Overture to the "Magic Flute;" Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" Overture; a piano Concerto of Norbert Burgmüller, and one of Schumann's finest early works: the Air with Variations in form of "Etudes Symphoniques," to be played by ERNST PERABO.—CAMILLA URSO is engaged for the fourth concert, to play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, when another Schumann Symphony, that in D minor, will be brought out.

A. W. THAYER's Life of Beethoven, Volume First, in German, actually lies before us! It came on Thanksgiving morning, not the least among our causes of sincere thankfulness that day. The author has had this volume translated into German, that he may get the benefit of German criticism on this part while he finishes the rest. A wise and conscientious plan, for which most biographical book-makers have not the patience! We shall describe its contents when we have had time to read it.

BROOKLYN, N. Y. Handel's oratorio Samson has been twice performed lately in Plymouth Church (Rev. H. W. Beecher's). First in order of preparation and announcement (some of Mr. Beecher's people having been interested in it pecuniarily long ago) was the performance by the New York Harmonic Society, on the 26th ult., with full chorus, orchestra, and the great organ of the church, Mr. F. L. Ritter conducting, and Mr. E. J. Connolly officiating as organist. Mrs. Fanny Raymond Ritter sang the part of Micah; Miss Maria Brainerd, Delila; Mr. Geo. Simpson, Samson; and Mr. J. R. Thomas, Manoah and Harapha. It was a satisfactory production, largely attended, though not crowded.

The earlier performance (Nov. 20th), which rather suddenly cut in before the other, was by Dr. H. S. Cutler's newly organized "Cecilian Choir," composed of sixty boys and forty men, without orchestra, Dr. Cutler accompanying at the organ, and Messrs. G. W. Colby and Frank Gilder at a grand piano. Mr. Geo. W. Morgan conducted, Mr. Simpson sang the part of Samson that time also, and Mr. Thomas, Manoah. Master Grandin, with his fine alto, won much praise in the part of Micah, and Master Breare, soprano, in that of Dalilah. Master Toedt, too, is mentioned honorably, and all the solos and choruses are praised in the journals. Yet we are informed that, although the boys sang well for boys, the monotony was extreme, especially in the solos, and many left the church long before it was over. "Cecilians" (shade of the sweet saint!) is rather a strange title for a choir of boys.

CONCORD, N. H. The State Musical Festival will be held in Eagle Hall for four days, beginning Monday evening, Jan. 7. Carl Zerrahn will conduct in the Oratorios; L. H. Southard in the Church Music, Glees, &c. For soloists are announced Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Addie Ryan, Messrs. James and M. W. Whitney. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with additional bass, supply orchestra. Concerts on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings; the first two miscellaneous; the last will comprise the larger portion of the Messiah, besides selections from Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Elijah. "G. W. F." was in error, in a late communication, in stating that the Creation would be given.

ST. LOUIS. The first concert (seventh series) of the Philharmonic Society, Mr. A. Waldauer conductor, took place at Philharmonic Hall, Nov. 15. The selections were: Overtures to Die Felsenmühle (Reisiger) and Semiramide; "Andante (?) and Menuetto" from Beethoven's 7th Symphony; March and chorus from Tannhäuser; Duet and chorus from Di-norah; Part-song, "Return of Spring," by Kalliwoda; Cavatina from Roberto Devereux; and a flute solo.

PHILADELPHIA. The Eve. Bulletin of Nov. 24, says:

An enormous audience filled every part of the Academy of Music last evening, when the Bateman Concert troupe and the Handel and Haydn Society of this city performed Rossini's Stabat Mater. The entertainment opened with Mendelssohn's overture to Ruy Blas, admirably played by a well-chosen orchestra, led by Mr. Carl Sentz. Next came Handel's "Let the Bright Seraphim," sung by Mme. Parepa, with horn obligato by Mr. Birgfeld, a difficult piece, in which the singer and player both acquitted themselves well. The first movement of a concerto for violin, by Lipinsky, was exquisitely played by Mr. Ross, well supported by the orchestra.

The Stabat Mater was opened well by the chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society, numbering two or three hundred good and well-trained voices. Signor Brignoli's "Cujus animam" was not a success. His beautiful voice is not trained for such music. He lacks the fervor and feeling that are required, and the occasional explosive delivery of a high note is no compensation for the absence of the qualifications really needed. The duo, "Quis est homo," was sung correctly, though Mme. Parepa sang her part very coldly. Mrs. Schimpf, though laboring under a cold, sang with much greater expression. Signor Ferranti's "Pro peccatis" was deficient in feeling, and his voice is not full enough to express the music in all its richness. The beautiful quartet, "Sancta Mater," has been much better sung on many occasions here, by artists all of whom were natives. Mrs. Schimpf's "Fac ut portem" was better done than any of the solos, and her appreciation of the music seemed to be much better than that of the artists of the Bateman troupe. In the "Inflammatum," Mme. Parepa appeared to the best advantage, and she was admirably sustained by the splendid chorus; it was heartily encored. The unaccompanied quartet, "Quando Corpus," was begun well, but Brignoli made an early blunder by taking a note in the phrase, "Paradisi gloria," a full tone too high. Then in the exquisitely modulated cadenza toward the close, Ferranti got wholly wrong, the other artists went astray or were struck mute, and it came to a premature close, to the confusion of the singers and the amusement as well as annoyance of the auditors.

Dec. 1. CARL WOLFSOHN'S FIRST MATINEE — The Foyer was occupied yesterday by a refined and elegant assemblage of music-lovers, to hear Mr. Wolfsohn interpret the works of old and new masters, who have written for the piano. He was highly successful in opening to the minds of his hearers the history of the progress and literature of his special instrument.

Mr. Wolfsohn's versatility and many-sidedness were exhibited in the excellent rendering of the programme, which included compositions of Bach, Haydn, Schumann, Chopin and Liszt; and it is to his credit that he did not fall short in any of the requirements of the widely different schools and epochs. Mr. Polak made a very agreeable impression upon his hearers, and was recalled in the song, In dunkler Nacht, by Luther (not Martin Luther, as many might erroneously suppose, but a modern writer), and being assured of his good standing with his audience, sang his encore with increased confidence and effect. He is a Hungarian of very fine presence, and is said to be a superior operatic artist.

The French Opera troupe of Messrs. Juignet & Drivet, have visited Philadelphia and performed "Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été" and other sparkling little French operas, Mlle. Naddi winning especial praise. They repeat the visit this week, giving Zampa and La Fille du Regiment.

WORCESTER follows the example of Boston and has musical festivals of her public schools. The "Star" of the Palladium (Nov. 28) writes:

Whoever entered Mechanics Hall on the evening of the 23d inst. must have noticed that the entire room was filled with a strange and peculiar sound. We cannot describe it; but it seemed as if the air were filled with little sprites who spoke a strange language, full of harsh gutturals yet softened as if by distance.

"Crashity, crashity, crash!
Thrashity, thrashity, thrash!"

That is as near as we can represent, with pen and ink, the subdued talking of fifteen hundred school children, who were ranged around the four sides of the hall, in the three galleries and upon the platform.

The occasion was the Annual Musical Festival of the Public Schools of Worcester, under the direction of their instructor in music, Mr. I. N. Metcalf. The lower schools were not represented, the choruses being sung by pupils of the High, Grammar, and Secondary Schools. It was one of the most interesting entertainments ever offered in Mechanics Hall, and showed that a great advance had been made in the singing of the scholars, and the selection of the music to be sung. The children looked fresh and happy, and, although an occasional paper missile, shot at some unfortunate wight in the audience, testified to the truth of the saying that "boys will be boys," their general demeanor was highly commendable to themselves and their instructors. A young man of very promising talents, a pupil of Mr. B. D. Allen, opened the concert with a highly creditable performance of Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata in A., and later in the evening, played portions of a Flute Concerto by Rink, introducing some beautiful combinations. Several pupils of the higher schools sang solos, duets, &c., adding much to the interest of the evening, and showing good voices, well trained. But the most noteworthy portions of the programme, rightly enough, were the choruses, of which the best in quality and performance were "See, the conquering hero comes," from Judas Maccabaeus, and "Freemen Rejoice!" by Parcell. Very good was the performance by the High School, of a glee by Eisenhofer, and "Morning's Ruddy Beam," by the Secondary Schools. One of the latter also sang, without accompaniment, a pretty part song about a certain "Little brown church in the vale," which called forth smiles and applause. Mr. Allen played the organ and piano accompaniments, and again we realized the worth of the great instrument which furnished a noble background for the fresh young voices.

A Visit to the Conservatory of Music at Naples.*

It was very important for me to become acquainted with the long-celebrated school of Music in Naples. While in Rome, I obtained a letter of recommendation to the professor of the violin at the institution in question, Signor Pinto, who has also to play in Naples generally the part of first violinist, or, as we say in Germany, Concertmeister. I fancied that, thus provided, I should easily obtain admission to the school. But this matter was attended with especial difficulties. In the first place, Sig. Pinto was nowhere to be found, a very characteristic trait, it struck me, of Neapolitan life. I went to the Teatro S. Carlo, to enquire of the hall-keeper the artist's address, as I knew Sig. Pinto was attached to the establishment. The hall-keeper intimated to me, in a kindly and compassionate tone, that I should have some trouble in presenting my letter, "for," he said, "you will not find Sig. Pinto at home. You may, however, come across him at Caffisch's pasticceria, in the Toledo," (the principal street of Naples), "for, as a rule, he looks in two or three times a day." My laudable attempt to catch the much desired violinist there, was, however, not crowned with success. Somewhat dispirited, I returned to my friend the hall-keeper at San Carlo, and begged him to put me in the way of pouncing upon Sig. Pinto somehow or other. "Oh," replied he, very sensibly, "go to the Conservatory during the time the Professor is delivering his lesson there." He told me, also, the exact hours when the object of my search was engaged in his professorial duties, and I took advantage of the first morning at my disposal to carry out my purpose. On entering the precincts of the Conservatory, which is located in the Franciscan Monastery of S. Pietro a Majella, I was astonished by a scene which produced upon me an effect as unusual as truly comic. In a spacious corridor, between 250 and 300 feet long, on the first floor, I found a number of the youthful pupils of the institution, clad, despite the lateness of the hour—it was ten o'clock—in the most daring morning costume, practising their various instruments, some of the pupils walking up and down while so engaged. Wind and string instruments, of various kinds and calibres, combined their sounds in a harmless medley. Runs, scales, sustained notes, etc., vibrated through the air and my nerves, which latter were already strongly affected by the noise of the Neapolitan streets. But the hopeful and youthful assembly were not disturbed in their experimental music by the arrival of a stranger, who, as they could easily perceive, was a foreigner, perfectly astonished at what he beheld. More especially impressed upon my memory are the performers on a bass trombone and a double bass. They extracted from their instruments such prodigious tones, that it seemed as though they had to prepare for playing at the Resurrection.

I slipped into a side-corridor, and met one of the servants of the establishment, whom I begged to take me to Sig. Pinto. He expressed his regret at not being able to gratify my wish, because Sig. Pinto had not yet arrived, though his hour had struck. In order to escape from the musical hubbub I have described, I asked to be conducted to the Librarian of the Conservatory, who had been described to me as a Signor Cavaliere Florimo. I thought that, with him, I might fill up the leisure time not quite unprofitably. And such was really the case. I found Signor Florimo an agreeable gentleman, who most readily and obligingly showed me the musical library under his care, and furnished me all the information I wished to obtain. We immediately plunged into a long conversation concerning the Institution, and I learned the following facts, which may interest others as they interested me.

The present organization of the Naples Conservatory dates from the year 1806, it being then that Napoleon combined in one institution the four musical schools existing there at that period. These establishments, the history of some of which extends back as far as the middle of the 16th century, that is to say, occupies a period of 300 years, were: the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini, the Conservatorio dei Poveri di Jesu Christo, the Conservatorio di S. Onofrio, and the Conservatorio di S. Maria Loretto. It would appear from the above titles that all the schools of music in Naples in those days, just as that at present existing, were, to some extent, connected with monasteries of the town, if only in so far as to employ for the profit of art the spacious precincts of such edifices. But, however this may be, it is very certain that, in the last century, the Italian priesthood took a lively interest in the musical aspirations of this highly gifted nation of the South. I need merely remind the reader of Bologna, where people, for instance, still retain a lively recollection of Pater Martino, an authority on counterpoint, whom even a Mozart could not help respecting.

Since the year 1826, the Naples Conservatory has been located in the Franciscan Cloister of S. Pietro a Majella already named. It enjoys a fixed annual income of not less than 200,000 francs. On hearing this sum mentioned, I involuntarily thought, with some little depression, of the very straitened pecuniary circumstances of our German schools of music, some of which, so far from being able to do aught for the advancement of art can, literally speaking, scarcely manage to exist. It is true that we possess nearly half-a-dozen Conservatories, but we cannot, probably, suppose any one of them really endowed with vitality, except the Leipzig School of Music, though it is very evident that this would prosper still more, if, in our native Germany, the door was not flung wide open for a highly injurious system of competition on the part of private individuals. Let us hope, however, that this state of things may, some day or other, be changed for the better. What might not be effected by a single Conservatory, properly endowed and sensibly organized, for the whole of Germany!

The subjects of study in the Naples Conservatory include not only every branch of music, but other departments of knowledge as well.* Besides going through an elementary course, the pupils are taught geography, history, and so on. Nay, they are even initiated in philosophy, though more for the name of the thing than aught else. In a country where, but a short time since, people were informed that it was not the earth that revolved round the sun, but the sun round the earth,† we cannot expect that the science of reason will really flourish, even though we leave out of consideration the fact that the Italians, whose minds are cast in a preponderatingly realistic mould, have always been but very poor philosophers.

The pupils, of whom 100 are taught gratuitously, are bound to attend the Institution at least six years. In some cases, however, they remain longer. In addition to receiving artistic and scientific instruction, they are also not only lodged but boarded free of cost. No pupil is admitted under the age of seven, while, on the other hand, no one is allowed to attend the Institution beyond his four-and-twentieth year. At present the number of students is 150. The staff consists—not counting the director—of twenty-one professors. All the instruments and music required for the pupils belong to the Institution. Among the violins, I saw some very good, though not first-rate, specimens of Gagliani, the Neapolitan violin-maker, who lived in the last century. The pianofortes, on the contrary, were bad. The wildest fancy cannot form a correct notion of the toneless, discordant, jingling machines, on which it is utterly impossible to play, that are manufactured here. But this is not an isolated case. Throughout Italy, the pianos are extremely mediocre, a fact in strong contrast with the feeling for tune inherent in the Italians, and based upon a felicitous natural aptitude of disposition.

During our conversation I was informed that the anxiously expected Sig. Pinto had arrived. I was immediately conducted to him. He most obligingly expressed his readiness to allow me to be present at the violin lesson he was about to give. We entered a room, in which some pupils were already assembled. Here I could not help again remarking, as I had already remarked on my entry into the Institution, that too much attention was not bestowed upon cleanliness. All present, with the exception naturally of the Professor, looked unwashed and unkempt, and, moreover, as regards their dress, they seemed to be clad as if they had but just left their beds. The room itself, too, was not the tidiest I had ever seen. But what matters a little dirt more or less in the wonderfully bright, pure, and clear air of the South? Kind Nature paralyzes it so marvellously, though, in saying this, I would not by any means be understood to assert that a little more attention to cleanliness would not be preferable. However, my attention was immediately diverted from this and similar matters, and directed to two pupils, each of whom played a violin solo, with pianoforte accompaniment. Both were admirable in the French-Belgian style, which is cultivated here with especial predilection and the devotion of elective affinity; for all Italian violinists adopt this style, owing to the want of a national school. Yet in this very country lived, as recently as the last century, those great masters of the violin, who marked an epoch and served as a standard for the whole world of music, and of whom we still learn, even at the present day, by tradition! However incredible this fact may appear, it is true.

Of the above two pupils, the second especially, who acquitted himself with extraordinary spirit and in the most masterly manner, engrossed my undivided attention. He played that technically difficult piece, the "Esmeralda Fantasia," by Antonio Bazzini, the celebrated Italian violinist, who is still living and well-known in Germany, and who, like Sivori, is one of the most renowned virtuosos of modern times.

After this performance, and others I heard during my visit, it struck me as evident that the practical cultivation of orchestral playing—according to the Italian standard—is zealously and successfully carried out, and I was able to compliment Sig. Pinto sincerely on the fact. As to how it fares with pianoforte playing and the vocal art, I could not, on account of the limited time at my disposal, satisfy myself. But if I might express an opinion on the pianoforte playing I had previously heard in Italy, it would, with some exceptions, not be, as a rule, very favorable. Then, however, the piano, on account of its poverty of tone and eminently ideal character, is no instrument for a nation that seeks and finds the greatest charm of musical enjoyment in sensually beautiful but, so to speak, tonally elementary melody.

That, on the other hand, since Verdi gave his compositions to the world, vocal art has visibly fallen off in Italy needs no longer any corroboration. As I was about leaving, I found an opportunity, which I had greatly desired, of making the personal acquaintance of the Maestro Saverio Mercadante, whose opera, La Vestale, I had heard in Rome. The grey-haired artist, who is nearly seventy years of age, and who, three years ago, had the misfortune to become totally blind, was delivering an address to a large number of the pupils, attended by some of the professors. He is a man of small, spare stature. His head was covered with a little velvet cap. He was sitting, in a dignified attitude, upon a sofa, while those present respectfully formed a semi-circle round him. He spoke in a clear and sharply accentuated voice, his words being enforced by animated gestures. Sig. Pinto seized a fitting opportunity to introduce me. The sprightly old gentleman immediately broke off his address, and entered with me into a conversation, in which, with almost diplomatic dexterity, he gave utterance to some well-turned remarks on German music and musicians. He ended by courteously charging my conductor to see that I carried away with me a favorable impression of the Institution committed to his care.

The Neapolitans have no little reason for being, to a certain extent, proud of this Conservatory; for not only is it the oldest of its kind in Europe, but many celebrated artists, including some masters of the first rank, received their professional education there. Among them, I will mention only the following:—Scarlati (the operatic composer), whose Christian name was Alessandro; Feo; Leo; Durante; Monteverde; Pergolese; Paisiello; Cimarosa; Spontini; and many more. The library, kept in admirable order by Sig. Florimo, contains a most valuable collection of manuscripts of the above mentioned, and other pupils, more or less celebrated, of the Conservatory. Among the autographic MSS., I observed two operas by Feo; eleven operas by Leo; some sacred compositions by Durante; six operas by Alessandro Scarlati; and several works by Pergolese.

Sig. Florimo informed me that he is at present engaged in writing a copious history of the Naples Conservatory. It will no doubt contain some important contributions to the history of music, and, in consequence, its publication must be expected with interest.

The Philosophy of the Fine Arts.

Philosophie der Schönen Künste: Architektur, Sculptur, Malerei, Musik, Poesie, Prosa. Von Ernst von Lasaulx. München: Literarisch-Artistische Anstalt der J. C. Cotta'schen Buchhandlung. 1866. [Philosophy of the Fine Arts. By Ernst von Lasaulx.]

Notwithstanding their creative activity as an artistic people, the Greeks did not philosophize deeply about art. Indeed, they were habitually inexact in all their classifications. Aristotle, for example, makes zoology, medicine, &c. branches of philosophy, and puts them in the same category with metaphysics. As regards the arts, he assumes that they are all imitations, and from this stand-point inquires, first, by what means the imitation is produced (form, color, tone, or word); secondly, what objects are imitated (emotions, actions, &c.); and thirdly, in what manner these objects are imitated. But he does not inform us what particular arts he would place under these several heads. He lays the foundation of a classification, but roars no superstructure upon it. Cicero divides the arts into silent (quasi mutæ artes), and speaking (oratio et lingua); the former are sculpture and painting, the latter are poetry and eloquence. Quintilian, applying to the arts the Aristotelian classification of the sciences, throws them into three groups: the theoretical (astronomy and philosophy); the practical (strategy, oratory, and dancing); and the poetical, comprising architecture, sculpture, and painting. These latter he also calls creative arts (artes effective). In like manner the Neoplatonic Plotinus divides them, first, into imitative arts, sculpture, painting, and dancing, which imitate forms and motions, and music, which imitates the innate harmonies of the human soul; secondly the practical arts, architecture and carpentry, which are expressions of the indwelling symmetry of the soul; and, thirdly, the theoretical arts, or those which are of a more ideal nature, such as geometry, poetry, oratory, and, highest of all, philosophy. The vice of these classifications obviously springs from the vagueness of the Greek and Latin terms which we are forced to translate by "the arts."

If now we turn to modern art-criticism, we find it equally arbitrary and unsatisfactory. Dante (De Monarchia, II.) remarks that art is conditioned by three things,—the spirit of the artist, the instrument which he employs, and the material in which he works; but he makes no distribution of the arts under this general principle. Kant (Kritik der Urtheilskraft, § 51) makes expression the basis of his classification. First, the speaking arts, poetry and eloquence; the latter of these treats a business of the understanding as if it were a free play of the imagination, whereas the former conducts a free play of the imagination as if it were merely a business of the understanding. Secondly, the formative arts, of which there are two subdivisions, those which are expressed in accordance with the truth of the senses (Sinnemüahrheit), comprising architecture and sculpture (die Plastik), and those which rest on an illusion of the senses (Sinnenschein), including painting and landscape-gardening. Thirdly, the art of the beautiful play of the emotions, or music. Solger (Ästhetik, p. 257) assumes five fine arts, which he divides into two groups, viz. Poesy and Art (Kunst). The former he regards as the universal art, embracing in itself all the others. The latter he subdivides into symbolical (architecture and sculpture) and allegorical (painting and music). Hegel looks at art from different points of view, and gives a classification as seen from each. Historically considered, he distinguishes three principal forms: the symbolical, or the art-panthemism of the Orient, the classical art of the Greeks and Romans, and the romantic art of the Christian nations of Western Europe. Again he speaks of the external art (architecture), the objective art (sculpture), and the subjective arts (painting, music, and poetry). Or, if we consider the sense to which the art appeals, we have architecture, sculpture, and painting, which appeal to the eye; music, which is addressed to the ear; and poetry, which speaks to the imagination. Or, finally distributing them into two groups, we have architecture and sculpture, which present the objective, and painting, music, and poetry, which express the innerness (Innlichkeit) of the subjective. Cousin places painting above sculpture and music, because it is more pathetic than the former and clearer than the latter, and expresses the human soul in a greater richness and variety of its sentiments. Poetry he calls the art par excellence. Architecture and gardening he puts together in one category, as the least free and lowest of the arts. It seems to us, however, more natural, following Kant's distribution, to associate gardening with painting, inasmuch as it is governed by the laws of perspective, and is picturesque rather than architectural. Fergusson divides the arts into three classes,—technic, æsthetic, and phonic. The technic culminate in upholstery, the æsthetic in music, and the phonic in eloquence. On this basis he erects a labyrinthian superstructure, through whose "wandering mazes" we have no disposition to conduct our readers.

It must be obvious to every one that all these classifications are more or less determined by a priori considerations, instead of being deduced from the nature and genesis of the arts and the law that controls their development. Every classification is imperfect, in so far as it is artificial. It is essential, therefore, to pursue a new method, to throw aside dogmatism and appeal to history, to study the arts in the process of their growth, and to adopt the arrangement into which we find them drawn by their natural affinities. The proper application of this method would render it necessary to trace the rise and progress of each art, and to show how the varying forces of nature, civilization, and social life have operated in developing and modifying man's artistic faculty; but this discussion is too broad for our present limits, and we must rest satisfied with a mere statement of the results to which such an investigation would lead.

By the fine arts, then, we mean architecture, sculpture, painting, music, poetry and prose. These may be divided into two equal groups. The first three, architecture, sculpture, and painting, address themselves to the eye, speaking to it in the dialect of form; they may therefore be called the arts of formed representation,—formative or imaging arts. The last three, music, poetry, and prose, address themselves to the ear, and may be termed the arts of oral representation, or speaking arts. We have enumerated them in the order of their logical relations and of their chronological development. The first of the fine arts in point of time, and the lowest as a means of expression, is architecture; the last in time and the highest (?) in expressiveness is prose. This classification corresponds to the historical growth of Grecian art. Art is originally an emanation of religious feeling. It springs from man's spiritual wants, which first seek expression in a rude symbolism. No pre-Hellenic people ever advanced beyond these religious beginnings of art. Such are the colossal temples of India, filled with gigantic images, monstrous in shape and yet every limb and lineament symbolical of certain divine attributes; also the monumental architecture of Egypt, massive and gloomy pyramids, obelisks emblematic of sacrificial flames, and all those stupendous structures that fringe the Nile from the Nubian desert to the Mediterranean. The Greeks were the first to idealize this symbolism and inspire it with a new principle, to modify it by intellectual and æsthetic culture, and melt it into a new metamorphosis, in which the sentiment of beauty blended with that of religion.

The six arts of which we have made mention rise one above the other, in a regular series; sculpture is higher than architecture, painting is higher than sculpture, music stands above painting, poetry above music, and prose (!) is the highest art of all. It will be observed, also, that in the exact ratio of the increase of the spiritual content of these arts there is a decrease of materiality in the form. In nature we see a progress from the inorganic to the organic, from organogens to living organisms, from the general substances and elementary bodies of chemistry to the special phenomena of physics, from the coral to the plant, from the plant to the animal, and from the animal to man; each "striving to ascend, and ascending in its striving." The stone or the metal, in its highest form of crystal, mimics the delicacy of the flower; the flower, with its organic functions and motions and the variegated plumage of its petals, is assimilated to the butterfly that hovers on free wings above it; and in the social life and cunning instincts of the bee, the bird, the ant, and the spider are typically foreshadowed the intelligence and moral affections of man. Each of these in the rising scale of creation is the realization of that which is below it, and the mute prophecy of that which is above it. In like manner there is a progress in art from architecture to sculpture, from sculpture to painting, from painting to music, from music to poetry, and from poetry to prose. All these have their root in a common sentiment; they are all manifestations of religious feeling working through the imagination, and there is no instance on record of supreme excellence in art, except in times of religious enthusiasm or among a people distinguished for religious sensibility. Art first built a temple to the gods, consecrated it with their images, beautified it with pictures of sacred scenes out of their lives, celebrated their praises in music and poetry, and, finally, recorded the fact and philosophized about it in prose. Thus in all its forms and creations it is but an expression of these first, deepest, and holiest emotions of the human soul.

The theory enunciated by Vitruvius and recently by Hlope, and tacitly assumed by Ruskin, that architecture had its origin in the rude efforts of man to shelter himself from the inclemencies of the sky, is not only false in principle, but at variance with fact. The hut of the shepherd, the tent of the nomad, the wigwam of the savage, and the cave of the troglodyte, which have been regarded as so many germs of architecture, have really no more connection with it than the den of the tiger or the lair of the wolf. It was from the impulse of religious feeling, and not under the stimulus of physical wants, that man became an architect. The temple is older than the house. Indeed, such a thing as domestic architecture was unknown previous to the Roman Empire. According to the old Hebrew legend, Adam built an altar to God before he put a roof over his own head. The earliest and rudest structures now existing on the face of the earth were dedicated to deities.

Much misconception will be avoided if we remember that a temple is not necessarily an edifice. This may be its accidental form, but does not constitute its distinctive character. It is essentially, as the etymology implies, (τέμενος, to cut off or set apart,) a consecrated spot, like that where Noah offered sacrifice when he issued from the ark. The hollow cedar containing a rudely carved image of the Arcadian goddess, of which Pausanias (VIII. 13. 2) speaks, was as much a temple as the Parthenon or the Pantheon. Indeed, the first temples seem to have been hollow trees in which images were placed; the Dodonean Jupiter dwelt in a beech, the Ephesian Diana in an elm, and it was not until 600 B. C. that she was honored with a temple in marble; and among the Germanic nations of Northern Europe, we find that the three gods of the ancient Prussians were worshipped in a sacred oak at Romove.* A Druidical circle of rough stones, like the celebrated Stonehenge, is as truly a temple as the classic peristyle. It may consist of a mound of earth, a solitary column, or a high rock like that on the shores of Lake Winnipeg, which the aborigines were accustomed to crown with wreaths of leaves and flowers; they are all alike sacred offerings to the gods, the tree and the monolith, as well as

"Doric pillars,
Coriaces and frieze, with bossy sculptures graven."

The Egyptian obelisk in Rome on whose granite sides are inscribed hieroglyphic hymns in praise of the sun, is as truly a temple as the Basilica of St. John Lateran, before which it stands. The cavern, or the rude lodge of wattled saplings, in which the primitive man found protection against heat and cold, may be the origin of house-building; but it is the stone pillar or the hollow-tree with the consecrated image in which we must seek the origin of temple-building, which is the source and genesis of all architecture.

Common usage applies the word architecture to every beautiful edifice; but there is essentially as much difference between temple-building and house-building, as there is between a moral and a meteorological necessity. In house-building everything is made subordinate to comfort and convenience. There may be displayed much mathematical knowledge and mechanical skill, but these do not raise it to the dignity of a fine art; it is still a handicraft. A house thus designed with inflexible reference to utility is no more architecture than a ship or a railroad. It may turn out to be beautiful, and so may the ship, which was built only to do service against wind and wave, or the steam-car, which moves wholly in obedience to mercenary impulses towards economical ends. The same movement of muscle may mould dough to make bread or clay to make statues, but how different is the spiritual process in each case. Architecture among the Greeks was never associated with the idea of use, and they made no pretensions to it in the construction of private dwellings. Athens was by no means a fine city like some of our modern ones, with whole streets of palaces occupied as the residences of private citizens. A stranger could have walked from the Piræus all through the lower town without imagining himself to be in the city which contained the greatest masterpieces of architecture. He would observe these only as he approached the public square and the Acropolis. We learn from Herodotus (V. 62) how small and insignificant, according to our notions, were the houses in which men like Themistocles and Aristides lived. As luxury increased, dwellings were built on a larger scale, but even these made no claims to architectural beauty, and did not rank among works of art. Yet they were regarded by the public with suspicion. Such was the house of Midias, the Athenian millionaire, which he erected at Eleusis, and for which he was severely censured by Demosthenes. Architecture put to private uses would have been to the Grecian mind an ostentation bordering on impiety. It was employed solely and sacredly in the construction of temples till after the Persian war, when it was applied also to theatres, concert halls, porticos, gymnasia, and public squares; but this too was a sacred use, inasmuch as all these places and edifices were dedicated to some divinity.*

It is true that in the heroic age we discover a tendency to beautify the residences of princes and make them objects of art; such were the mansions of Menelaus and Alcinoüs, as described in the fourth and seventh books of the Odyssey. But it must be remembered that these palaces were essentially palace-temples, and that with them was associated the idea of hero-worship. Art can never develop itself freely when it comes in contact with utility. The Greeks scrupulously avoided this antagonism. The best house-builders in Athens would not have presumed to place themselves on a level with Ictinus and Kallikrates, the builders of the Parthenon. However great their constructive skill, they were still mechanics and not architects. Posterity did not treasure their names; they passed away and were forgotten with the cessation of those physical wants which it was their sole office to supply; whilst the memory of the architect remained as imperishable as the divine conceptions which he sought to express. Secular architecture grew up out of national decay and religious degradation. With the deification of the Roman Emperors certain parts of the temples were transferred to the imperial palaces. Julius Cæsar was the first man who adorned his house with a pediment, and even he was permitted to do it only by a special decree of the Senate. Thus gradually, and as it were under protest, began the decline of sacred architecture. The change advanced with the degeneracy of the people and the darkening of the religious consciousness. Columns were attached to the villas, and private dwellings were decorated with pilasters and rich entablatures. This desecration of the temple-style culminated in the famous "Golden House" of Nero, in the vestibule of which stood his own colossal statue one hundred and twenty feet high. The distinction between house and temple being thus broken up, sacred architecture became rapidly secularized in the midst of a vast material civilization, which seems almost to have deified roads, bridges, aqueducts, triumphal arches, the circus, and the Colosseum.*

* Among the Romans, religion was degraded into a mere function of the state; and patriotism (an intense but narrow sentiment) became the inspiring principle of art as well as of morals. Thus the themes of Roman sculpture were not religious, but patriotic, and represented, not gods, but heroes; they sought their ideals of excellence, not in the genealogical records of Olympus, but in the annals of their own robust virtue and prowess.

The Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

BY A. OULIDICHEFF.*

Great in all things, in counterpoint as in melody, Mozart must naturally have preferred to the strict Fugue that which is termed the free, and which, admitting of a blending of the two opposite styles, opened an unlimited field to the universality of his genius. His finest work in this kind had been the finale to the Symphony in C (the "Jupiter"). Many amateurs find all fugues alike. But surely no one will maintain this of the finale to the Symphony, and of our overture; for these two works no more resemble one another than they do the thousands of fugues, which have preceded them or followed them, and they can only be compared together to bring out their absolute contrast all the more. The finale rests upon four rival themes, whose combination irresistibly and above all calls up the image of a gigantic conflict. The severe taste, the original harshness of the counterpoint is felt in many passages, and the harmonic fermentation, which arises from the collision of these hostile elements, and which is so very grateful to the ear of the connoisseur, is for the majority of dilettanti but a senseless discord, as I have had occasion enough to convince myself personally. There is no easy ear-tickling in that music. The work seems to address itself as much to the critical intelligence as to the fancy of the hearer; and if there are few compositions which so seize upon one by their grandeur and their power, there are perhaps none which for their right appreciation require a more cultivated musical insight.

Imagine now the opposite of what has just been said, and you will have a pretty good idea of the overture. This has but one theme, and even in the development of this one theme the science of the composer appears still more wonderful, if possible, than it has been in the most prodigious movements of the finale. Between the theme and the counter-theme there exists no appearance of conflict, not once a single shadow of opposition. All is pure and clear. All is heavenly in the harmony of this fugue, all streams in most melodious splendor, all is euphonious enjoyment, rapture, inexpressible charm, alike for the learned musician and for the common music-lover, in short for all musical ears. Mozart wished that the introduction to the piece should bespeak attention with an at once solemn and mystical authority, and with the most éclatant euphony, as if the slow tempo should say to one: "Prepare yourself to be apprised of something which you never heard before, and which no one will ever let you hear again."

It were an error to believe, that the unique euphony and magic charm, which make of the Allegro such a ravishing music to everybody, merely affect us more, because the conditions of the fugued style here are mitigated; in other words, because the work is not a strict and regular fugue. It is as learned a work as ever proceeded from a head that would know of nothing short of Double Counterpoint and Canon. To the main laws of the genus Mozart has added furthermore the unity of thought. Although this fugue is free, it is still almost without interruption; it is formed in the mere subject; that subject never leaves you for a moment. In the fugue you hear it as the Dux and Comes (leader and companion); in the melodic portion of the overture it accompanies the song passages, which come in like solos; and it is its image, again, which is reproduced more or less in fragments by the tutti of the orchestra. Without the subject the least particulars of the work were inconceivable! This theme is a veritable enchanter; it possesses the gift of infinite self-transformation. It assumes all forms; it flies off in sparks, it dissolves in shimmering rose-colored drops, it rounds itself into a globe, it sprinkles itself in pearly rain, it flashes in diamonds and overflows the green lap of the fields like an enamelled flowery carpet; or it rises like a gentle mist into the upper regions. But various as the splendor is of these fantastical creations, perpetually interweaving, still it is not given to it to divest itself of its original form. Whether it appear as a Jack-o-lantern or as a thundering meteor, we, the clairvoyant spectators, always recognize it. When its figure is but little or not at all disguised (that is to say, so long as the composition continues a fugue), it constantly regenerates itself from itself, flings itself back and re-unites in in-finitum; it creeps in everywhere in the accompaniment to another subordinate form (the counter-subject), which, like the gossip, or to speak more reverently, the famulus of the magician, transforms itself as dexterously as he does. Suddenly the chase disperses itself in a multitude of little parcels. An enchanting, shining apparition steps into its place. Verily, this is it no longer! Nevertheless it is it; examine it closely and you will see the fragments of its original form, flung off in all directions, quivering in space and gathering like a halo round the apparition, into which it has transformed a portion of its substance. (The solos, accompanied by fragments of the fugue).

Suddenly all has vanished. A serious and solemn summons, thrice repeated in the same expressions, a peremptory will, before which the necromancer's might must bow, has scattered the enchantment. Is the magic spectacle all over? No, only the first act. Our hobgoblin of a theme must know the principle of progression of interest; but how enhance the miracle already wrought? We shall see. The Allegro begins again and the subject comes back, this time however under a wholly different physiognomy, transposed into B flat minor. The counter-theme takes also a new form and a new gait; here begins the middle period and we penetrate into the sanctum of the enchanter, which one might fancy to be lighted by the soft and pallid fire of a moonlight rainbow. Whence come all these syren voices, singing unknown words? In what firmament shine those stars, that group themselves in melodious and mystic constellations in the flute and fagotto, which whisper in the strings and stream out in the oboes like a long train of light? The bliss of an inextinguishable supernatural contentment permeates the soul, caressingly, from all sides. Soon clearest day illumines the scene. The theme gathers itself into a bright focus, and the counter-subject, darting its beams to all parts of the world, lets off fireworks, whose petards, rockets, bomb-shells, Roman candles start off one by one, mount into the air, hiss, crackle, dazzle, go out and rain sparks upon you as they fall, so that you know not where to turn. The variations of the theme fly every way, intermingling with the pieces of those magic fireworks, or if you prefer, those gleaming northern lights. Again some fragments of the first half of the overture present themselves, yet, be it understood, with transformations, since, as little as it lies in the nature of the subject wholly to conceal itself, past finding out, so little can it for an instant remain altogether like itself.

The concluding sentence, in melodic style and beginning with a crescendo, is of a grandiose and original effect, full of reverberation and of majesty. Here something comes along, something, which is little in the outset, but which swells more and more and soon attains to an enormous volume, and waves its gigantic wings, with the roar of the hurricane, over the hearer's head. In the midst of the heaviest storm resounds a reminiscence of the theme towards the close, through the stunning unisons of the entire orchestra.

In this way has the overture to the Zauberflöte become the crown of all instrumental music, nunc et in secula. (!)

We must now speak of the psychological meaning of this work; although in this connexion it hardly admits of comment in a positive manner. In the other overtures of Mozart the thought is always unmistakably explained by the contents of the poem. But here we have essentially pure music, a music limited in its development and its effects by no pre-* Volgt. Geschichte Preussens, I. 580, 596.

* What is here said of architecture is, of course, true of all the fine arts. Pausanias, who travelled through Greece in the second century of the Christian era, and described the works of art then existing, does not mention a single one as the property of a private citizen. So when Verres plundered Sicily, his accusers, who cannot be supposed to have concealed anything, charge him with carrying off only public works of art; at the same time, it is said that he appropriated these treasures wherever he could find them; and if private persons had possessed such works of art, nothing would have prevented him from taking them. To be sure, Cicero speaks of four statues taken from a certain Helus. But they stood in his sacrum or chapel, not in his house, and were therefore public, in the sense of being consecrated to a religious use.

determined condition. The commentary upon such a work will always be correct, if every one on hearing it will describe whatever enchantment he has felt, whatever splendor he has dreamed. Perhaps these individual glosses will not differ from one another so very much in men in whom the poetic instinct reveals itself most manifestly through a lively tendency to harmony. Perhaps it would be found that our overture had an analogous root in the dreams of childhood, while just approaching the age of maturity, when reason has not yet wholly broken through the shell, passion still sleeps, but is already just beginning to awake, and fancy with its partiality for the marvelous reigns almost uncontrolled. Every age has, we know, its characteristic dreams, which do not show themselves in the other periods of life. Who of us can be so unfortunate as to have wholly lost the memory of the dreams he had at the age of from nine to twelve; who can have lost entirely out of recollection all those lovely images, which then floated round him? But no one will forget also the bitter illusions which followed upon that waking, and the tears which wetted the pillow of the child, torn from his enrapturing visions!

Here arises a question of the highest interest. How could a fugue, and indeed one of the most learned, blend with the character of ravishing enchantment, that we find in it? To that we know no answer. We might say, to be sure, that the invention of the subject was one of those happy accidents of genius, which are so rare that perhaps they never twice occur to genius itself. In fact a village organist might have invented the four bars of the theme as well as Mozart. But what would he have made of it? One of those contrapuntal skeletons with two or three legs, as Beethoven humorously called them, in the remarks he wrote upon the margin of his studies. The pearls would have changed into millet for the cock. I go still farther and ask, whether among all old and modern contrapuntists there be one found, who would not in regard to this pearl have been a cock? Bach would have made a Bach fugue, Handel a Handelian fugue of it; very beautiful and very learned works they would have been, greatly admired by connoisseurs, but in which the profane would have found small relish, and which would always remain fugues in the ears of all the world. The only lapidary, capable of setting the pearl in such way that everybody, that is to say all ears, could recognize its priceless worth, was named Mozart. And he it was who found it.

It must not be overlooked, that the material effect contributed much to the popularity of this wondrous work. If the instrumentation of our day has made some progress compared with the symphonies and overtures before Mozart, this progress was in every respect overtaken by the overture to the Zauberflöte. In the first place Mozart has combined in it all the instruments which could be employed in the orchestra at the end of the last century; he has carried the number of voices beyond twenty,—a thing which he has never before done in any of his instrumental compositions. A still more important distinction is, that the wind instruments have as much to do as the quartet, if not more. Finally Mozart in no one of his other works has married the tone-colors with so much charm and seductiveness, or distributed the roles of the Symphony in a manner better suited to the special talents of the actors. From the violins and flutes even to the kettle-drums, all are constantly employed in the most advantageous manner. And therein lies, as we have said, the whole improvement of the present instrumental system: a dazzling euphony, a deep calculation of material effect and the lending of a new importance to the younger instruments of the orchestra, namely the wind instruments, which for more than a century had been subordinated to the string instruments. Study the passages and combinations of our overture and you will find that they have served as patterns for the most richly instrumented compositions of Beethoven and of other very much younger masters.

Such was the last secular work of Mozart, the last and most wonderfully perfect in respect of style. Already for some years the flame of life had been growing pale upon the young man's brow and was extinguished in his bosom. The productive energy of the artist was also on the wane, although at a much slower and almost imperceptible rate. But this dying flame seems suddenly to cast a new splendor about it; this enfeebled energy all at once overflows with a development of luxury and of fancy, to which Mozart had not yet accustomed his admirers; the swan has tuned his farewell song; the dying man utters his novissima verba, as the ancients used to say, exalted words, in which the spirit of Mozart, half freed from its integument, appears to us as if it were already beginning to become transfigured; words which every one hears in the "Requiem" and in the overture to the Zauberflöte, which was its brilliant and immortal prelude. The image of paradise connects itself with the images upon his death-bed!

Besides this biographical signification of the Swan-song, the queen of fugues has still another, which assigns to it an ever memorable place in the annals of art.

As Mozart had included the poetic life under all its phases in the greatest of his operas, so too he had summed up therein the totality of his nature in regard to the means of musical expression, which was as it were the outward manifestation of that nature. Don Giovanni indicated on a grand scale the earthly mission of our hero in the eyes of all the world; a more summary and more special account rendered before artistic people had also to sum up the universality of Mozart's style in its technical and historical relations. How reads the commission of the predestined composer? To gather up the harvest of the centuries, and to combine it in the present, past and future of music. Faithful to this vocation and arrived at the end of his career, Mozart seems to have drawn up in notes for the musicians a report, of some twenty pages, upon the manner in which he had fulfilled the instructions of Providence. We find therein the clearest melody, the most ideal sense, the most fascinating results of material euphony, the most splendid instrumentation, new and even modern effects, in union with the anti-melodic and anti-expressive form of the old fugue. Nay more, all this was strictly deduced from this form; without this it would have been just nothing. In these twenty and odd pages the fundamental law of every work of art: Unity and Variety, was observed with such an absolute power of concentration and of radiant diffusion, that there are no two combinations to be found in it whose similarity amounts to identity, and not one, in which you do not see the same creative thoughts flash back.

JINGLING PIANOS. Amongst the minor troubles to which music-loving mortals are liable, a jingling note in the piano must assuredly find a place. It is a very small matter, it is true, but it is excessively annoying, and the more so as it generally baffles all endeavors to find out the cause. Many of our readers have doubtless spent an hour or so in such an investigation, perhaps on more than one occasion, and without success. One jingling note in a piano is quite sufficient to spoil the effect of the finest piece of music, and instead of soothing has rather the effect of irritating the savage breast. In the first place, it must be recollected that the ear is exceedingly defective in the power of judging of the direction of a sound; and it is upon this defect that the ventriloquist depends for the marvellous displays to which we are accustomed. We must also remember that a body capable of producing a sound of a certain pitch may be set in vibration by sounding the fundamental note of the body. Thus the glass globes of the chandelier may be caused to sound simply by singing the note which they respectively give out when put into vibration by a blow; and it is said that a singer with a very powerful voice is able to break a wine-glass by merely singing the fundamental note in close proximity. The particles of the glass are caused to vibrate so powerfully as to overcome their cohesion, thus acting in precisely the same manner as a sharp blow. The vibrations thus induced are called sympathetic vibrations; and it is on this principle that most of the jingling in pianos and other stringed instruments is to be explained. In fact, the noise is not in the instrument at all, but is due to some object in the room which is caused to vibrate sympathetically whenever a certain note is struck.

The subject has recently been investigated by Professor Page of the United States, who is well known for several ingenious electro-magnetic experiments, and also for the discovery of the fact that a soft iron bar, when suddenly magnetized, gives out a musical note. The results of his investigation into the cause of the jingle of certain notes on the pianoforte and other musical instruments have been communicated by him to the Scientific American. Professor Page relates an instance of a new piano which had a jingling note, which for some time defied all efforts to discover the cause. Whilst one person continued to strike the offending note, another went about the room touching everything which could possibly be set in vibration. At last the cause was found to be in a clock on the mantelpiece. The striking part had run down, and upon winding it up the jingle ceased. In another case the cause was found to be due to two loose panes of glass in the windows. When the loose squares were wedged up the instrument gave a perfectly clear note, and on the removal of the wedges, the jingle instantly recommenced. In some cases a slight change in the position of the piano will stop the noise, or transfer it to other notes. To account for this, Professor Page says, "It is probable that absolute unison is necessary to produce the sympathetic sounds to any notable degree, and that the motion of the instrument upon the floor produces a change of tension, either on or in something without the instrument so as to affect the result."

In case of annoyance from a jingling piano, it would be well, therefore, before condemning the instrument, to make careful search amongst the window panes, chimney ornaments, lamp shades, and other objects capable of being put into vibration. A few minutes will generally be sufficient to remedy the evil.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The correspondent of the London Orchestra (Nov. 20) writes:

"Mignon," opera comique in three acts and five tableaux, arranged by the inseparable MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré (known as the Siamese librettists), music by M. Ambroise Thomas, was given on Saturday last at the Opera Comique. I feel a strong temptation to send you a splendid article, of at least a dozen columns, on Goethe and "Wilhelm Meister," but as, after all, you never did me any harm, I refrain, and will, in as few words as possible, sketch out the arrangement the authors have thought fit to adopt. The first act introduces us to the actress, Philine, who is en coquetterie réglée with Wilhelm Meister; and we have all the scene in which he rescues Mignon from her master, "le grand diable." The old harpist, Lothario, is also introduced, and sings flat. Act 2. Mignon is costumed as a page, and accompanies her master to Philine's house. She is left alone for a short time, and, seeing the handsome dresses of the comédienne, she cannot resist the temptation of trying them on. Wilhelm arrives at this moment, and tells her that they must part. Despair of Mignon, &c.; consolations from the old harpist, who again sings flat, and sets fire to the house. Mignon is saved from absolute calcination by Wilhelm. We find them in the last Act at Venice in an ancient palace, formerly the property of the harpist, who turns out to be Count Ceperano and the father of Mignon. Philine, who has followed Wilhelm Meister, graciously gives her consent to his union with Mignon, and tout est pour le mieux dans le meilleur des mondes. Compare this sketch with the original work and see which you like best. Monsieur Ambroise Thomas's music is simply charming. Setting aside the trivial character of the part of Philine, for whom of course—as represented by Mme. Cabel—more "cocottes" than melodies are required, the rest of the score is admirable. Mignon's song in the first act, "Kennst du das Land," is a beautiful inspiration, and is the more worthy of notice on account of the difficulty of setting it to music after Beethoven's lovely version. A duet for contralto and basso "Légères: Hirondelles," the which birds MM. Barbier and Carré inform us are "armés de Dieu," another duet for the same "Tu connais la douleur," a romance for Wilhelm, his love duet with Mignon, and a trio in which the father recovers his long lost "child" are the most remarkable numbers, to which may be added the opening chorus, full of melody, and fresh and gay as a morning of spring.

M. Ambroise Thomas is the chief of our young composers. I say "young" composers, for a musician generally begins to have a name at fifty. Ask M. Auber. M. Thomas is a professor of composition at the Conservatoire, Membre de L'Institut, and Officier de la Légion d'Honneur. His musical education was given him at the Conservatoire by Zimmermann, for the piano; Dourlen (harmony), and Lesueur (Composition). After receiving a first prize for piano in 1829, M. Thomas obtained the Grand Prix de Rome in 1832. His first opera was "La Double Echelle," 1837; this was followed by "Le Peuple de la Régence," 1838; "La Gipsy," ballet at the opera, 1839; "Le Panier Fleuri," opera comique in the same year; "Carline," 1840, &c. M. Thomas's real success dates from "Le Caid" (1849), a charge of the Italian style of writing, which answered remarkably well, and is still a stock piece in the repertoire of the Opera-Comique. "Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été," which has nothing but its title in common with "The Midsummer Night's Dream," and in which Queen Elizabeth, Shakespeare, and Falstaff are the principal characters, was given in 1850, and placed M. Thomas at the head of the young school. Add to the works already named, "Raymond," 1851; "La Tonelli," 1853; "Psyche" (a real chef-d'œuvre), and "Le Carnaval de Venise," both in 1857; and you will admit that what they call here the composer's "musical baggage" is sufficiently imposing. M. Thomas does not belong to the school of anti-melodist; his ideas are always elegant, in perfect form, and sometimes of a very high character. His orchestral writing is acknowledged to be that of a real maître; and in everything that he composes there exists a certain touch, scarcely to be defined, and which can only be explained by saying that you feel that it is written by a gentleman; and this quality gives a relief to the ordinary portions of his works, and an additional enjoyment to the best written numbers. Now a word for the actors; Mignon was represented by Mme. Galli-Marie, and a better choice could not have been made. This lady had already "created" the page in "Lara" and the Bohemian girl in "Fior d'Aliza," and this last impersonation of Mignon, given with the greatest poetic feeling, has fixed her in her proper place as the best interpreter of what we may call real "character" parts that we have among the lady artists of the present day. Her singing of the romance in act 1 (alluded to above), her rendering of the words "Tu connais la douleur," the furious outburst of her Bohemian instinct when she says "Ah! cette Philine! je la hais," were really fine. The love duet with Wilhelm Meister in the last act is not only a charming musical composition, but is arranged by the régisseur, M. Mocker, with a rare talent of mise en scène. Instead of the stereotyped stage business, with "cross x., cross L." &c., Mignon is leaning against a window, with the moonlight streaming on her countenance, and the whole scene between the two passes in one corner of the vast salle of the Venetian palace. Mme. Galli-Marie has adopted the costume of Ary Scheffer's painting, and her poses and acting in this duet and the "recognition" trio are really splendid. M. Achard has what we call an "ungrateful" part as Wilhelm, as far as acting is concerned; but the musical portion of his task is good, and he sings it well. It seems strange to ask an artist to be a little less careful, but really if M. Achard would try a little imprévu from time to time, I, for one, would not blame him. He is so fearfully methodical that I feel inclined to believe what M. Vizentini says of him in the "Charivari":—"M. Achard carries a note-book in his pocket, and inscribes his impressions after each scene, thus:—Mme. * * * forgot a demisemiquaver rest in the Andante in A flat: had something in my throat in giving my B in alt, but got rid of it in time; the public was indulgent; got to the theatre too late, dinner being behind time; must scold my wife on that account; dressed hastily in consequence; called before the curtain at the end of Act 1; my boots are tight—music charming—I must change them." Monsieur Coudere, the Charles Mathews of the Opera Comique, plays Laertes, a comedian, admirably, and is very useful in Act. 2, which "languishes." The Harpist Count is represented by M. Bataille. Mme. Cabel is the Philine. She has nothing to do but vocalize, and that she does admirably. The part is not sympathetic, and is only saved from utter condemnation by the music the composer has allotted to her. Somme toute, a success, and a run of at least sixty nights, if not more.

Beethoven's Missa Solennis in D was performed (for the first time in Paris) on the 22nd Nov., in the church of St. Eustache, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup. The occasion was the festival of the patron saint, Cecilia.

The sixth Concert Populaire of classical music in the Cirque Napoléon, on the 25th ult., had for programme: Beethoven's 1st Symphony; Schumann's Genoève Overture; Adagio from a Haydn Quartet, by all the strings; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by Joachim; and Wallace's Overture to Lo-relei. Pasdeloup conducted.—In the preceding concert were given: Overture to Fidelio (in E); Symphony No. 29, by Haydn; Allegro (op. 58), Mendelssohn; Beethoven's Concerto in D for piano, No. 6, [it must mean the Violin Concerto as arranged by B. for piano], played by M. Theo. Ritter; Overture to Oberon.

M. Féis, the historian of "La Marseillaise," known as an expert in finding out "mares' nests"—has discovered—so he assures the Gazette Musicale—the entire plan and programme of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," in an orchestral work by Knecht, an obscure musician, belonging to the Palatinate, who wrote in defence of his master, the Abbé Vogler, and who lived a quiet life, and produced heaps of those compositions, carefully made, yet without a spark of imagination. Knecht's "Musical Portrait of Nature, or Grand Symphony," published A.D. 1784, and prefaced by a programme, is in five divisions, which may be shortly described thus:—"A beautiful smiling landscape, with birds, brooks and shepherds."—"The darkening of the sky and the rising of the wind."—"The storm."—"The clearing off of the storm."—"The joy of Nature, and its grateful praise of the Almighty." What is more curious still, another of Knecht's compositions bears the title of "Peasants' Dance interrupted by a Storm."

Germany.

COLOGNE.—The programme of the second Gürzenich concert consisted of Overture (Jul. Tausch); Aria for soprano from Scipione (J. Ch. Bach), Mme. Rudersdorff; Fantasia for Violoncello (A. Schmidt), Herr A. Schmidt; Canzonet (Haydn), Mme. Rudersdorff; Adagio and Finale from Concerto in B minor (Hummel), Mme. Johnson Gräver; Finale from Loreley (Mendelssohn), and Sinfonie in D minor (Schumann)—Sig. and Mad. Marchesi gave a concert on the 13th inst., in the Hôtel Disch. A great feature of the evening were some songs, by Ferdinand Hiller, for three Female Voices, sung by eighteen pupils of the Conservatory. The other vocal pieces were Schumann's "Frauenliebe und Leben," Mme. Marchesi; two duets composed by Ferdinand Hiller for Sig. and Mme. Marchesi; duet from Rossini's Semiramide; air from "La Resurrezione," by Handel; Schubert's "Erlkönig;" and "Pourquoi." The instrumental pieces were Mozart's Variations for Four Hands, and some movements from Ferdinand Hiller's Operette ohne Worte, played by Herren Hiller and Gernsheim.

The programme of the third Gürzenich Concert was varied and interesting in every respect, and the English public may be proud to have been represented by an eminent composer and a highly gifted singer. The composer in question was Jules Benedict. The singer was Miss Marianne Hayne, a pupil of the Conservatorium. Benedict contributed the overture to the "Tempest," which was capitally rendered by the famous orchestra under F. Hiller, and enthusiastically applauded by the large and select audience. Miss Hayne, who is endowed with a splendid soprano voice and a capital method, sang the air from the "Creation," "With verdure clad" (in German), to perfection. An interesting feature of the programme was the unfinished Symphony, No. 2 (Allegro, Andante, and Scherzo) by Robert (Norbert) Burgmüller, born in Düsseldorf, 1810, and died at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1836. It is a remarkable work, full of melodies and delicately scored, belonging to the calm romantic school of Haydn and Mozart rather than to the heroic and dramatic métier of Beethoven. The Scherzo, as being immensely fresh and taking, was the most successful part of this fine symphony. Julius Stockhausen, the well-known Liedersänger and Musikdirector in Hamburg, sang on the same evening the aria buffa, "Il mio pino è preparato," from "La Gazza Ladra," by Rossini. This aria, calculated as it is for the stage alone, produces no effect at all in a concert room, and although masterly snug and adorned with the most arduous agility did not meet this time with a better chance than usual. Besides this the air requires the vis comica of Ronconi (who always produced a great effect with it in London), which Herr J. Stockhausen lacks completely. More successful was this gentleman in a ballad of Schumann, "Die beiden Grenadiere," which was unanimously encored. The Walpurgisnacht, Goethe and Mendelssohn, which closed the concert in splendid fashion, did not at all answer the expectation of the disappointed audience. The tenor, an ex-primo, was a very unpoetical production in every respect. The contralto was unwell, and sang her little solo sotto voce. Stockhausen got hoarse as usual, and the chorus had not sufficiently rehearsed the work.

At the next Gürzenich concert we shall hear the "Saffi" of F. Hiller, the soprano solo of which will be sung by a pupil of the Conservatorium, who is in possession of a quality of voice and talent à la Lind. Her name is Fräul. Mathilde Bodinus, the daughter of the director of the zoological garden here.

LEIPZIG.—The works performed at the fourth Gewandhaus Concert were: Symphony, No. 8, Beethoven; "Entr'acte" from Medea, Cherubini; "Pascaglia" (C minor), and "Toccata" F major, Bach, scored for full band by Esser; Recitative and Aria for soprano, with obligato piano, Mozart; Cantata, Stradella; "Siciliana," Handel; and "Pastorale," Haydn. The vocal pieces were admirably sung by Mdme. Rudersdorff.—On the 4th inst., was given the first of the series of Soirées for Chamber Music announced by Herren David, Röntgen, Hermann, and Hegar. The programme consisted of Stringed Quartet in G, from Opus 9, Beethoven; Quartet in E minor, from Opus 44, Beethoven; and "Divertissement" in D major, for Stringed Instruments and two Horns, Mozart.—At the second concert of the Enterpe Association, the works selected were Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Beethoven; Schumann's C-major Symphony; two Duets: "Schönes Mädchen, wirst mich lassen," from Jessonda, and "Theures Mädchen, sagte er," from Templer und Jüdin, sung by Mdlle. Blaczek and Herr Rebling. Mdlle. Mehlig played Chopin's F. minor Concerto; Prelude and Fugue, E minor, Mendelssohn, and "Rhapsodie Hongroise," C sharp major, Franz Listz.

Herr Röntgen will not accept the offer lately made him from St. Petersburg, but continue here as usual.—Riedel's Association performed Beethoven's grand Missa Solennis on the 23rd November.—At the third Enterpe Concert, the programme comprised the Overture to Die Vestalin, Spontini; Violin Concerto, Mendelssohn; Two Songs for mixed Chorus ("Süd oder Nord," and "Das Schifflein"), R. Schumann; B flat minor Etude, Paganini; and "Anacreon, oder Amor auf der Flucht," Cherubini. The violin part was confided to Herr Auer from Hamburg, while the solos in Cherubini's works were sung by Mdlle. Blaczek and Herr Rebling.—The fifth Gewandhaus Concert afforded the public an opportunity of hearing Lachner's Second Suite (E minor); Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Gluck; Pianoforte Pieces (Herr Reinecke); Beethoven's Concerto, No. 1 (C major); and Solo Pieces by Rameau, Couperin, and Kirnberger. Madame Rudersdorff sang Randegger's "Save me, O God!" a Scene and Aria by Mozart; and the Aria, "O holder Schlaf," from Handel's Semle.—Herr Gustav Schmidt, the composer of the operas, Prinz Eugen and La Rode, will celebrate the 25th anniversary of his conductorship on the 2nd inst.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—At the third Museum Concert, the band performed: C-major Symphony, Haydn; Entr'acte to Rosamunde, Franz Schubert; and Overture to Abu Hassan, Cherubini. Mad. Clara Schumann played Schumann's A-minor Concerto, together with some smaller pianoforte pieces; and Herr Hett sang some songs by Schubert and Schumann.

WIESBADEN.—The Intendant of the Theatre Royal has announced six Subscription Concerts, at which, in contradistinction to the displays of frivolous virtuosity forming the staple attraction at the concerts got up by the directors of the Kurhaus, classical works alone will constitute the programme. Herr Jahn has been selected as conductor, and the following works will be played at the first concert: Part First. "Pascaglia," J. S. Bach (scored by H. Esser); Recitative and Aria from Rinaldo, Handel (scored by Meyerbeer); Overture to Ali Baba, Cherubini; Serenade for five Female Voices, F. Schubert; Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, R. Wagner. Part Second. Sinfonie in G major (6), J. Haydn.

BRESLAU.—The programme of the second concert given by the Orchestra-Verein contained a highly interesting Suite in D major (Bach), in which Dr. Damrosch took the violin solo. The second number was Beethoven's Triple Concerto (Op. 56), played by Dr. Damrosch, violin; Herr Seidel, piano; and Herr Grützmacher, violoncello. The second part consisted of the Overture to Guillaume Tell; an original Fantasia, performed by Herr Grützmacher; and Mozart's Symphony in G minor.

MUNICH.—The Count von Platen, Intendant under the late government at the Theatre Royal, Hanover, has been appointed to the same post at the Theatre Royal here. Herr Krempelsetzer, conductor at the Actientheatre, is engaged on an operetta entitled Die Geister des Weins. The members of the Oratorio Association, under the direction of Herr Rheinberger, are getting up Handel's Saul. Rheinberger's Symphony Wallerstein will, also, be produced shortly.

STRASBURG.—The Société des Concerts of the Conservatoire has given its first concert, directed by M. Hesselmanns, with this programme: Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Air from Mozart's Tito, sung by Mme. Viardot; Mendelssohn's Melusina Overture; Scene from Gluck's Alceste (Mme. Viardot); March from the Ruins of Athens.

SWITZERLAND.—At the first Subscription Concert, in Zurich, under the direction of Herr Hegar, Beethoven's "Sinfonia Eroica," and Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," were performed. Joachim played a Concerto by Spohr, a Romance by Beethoven, and a Fantasia by Schumann. It is almost superfluous to add that the audience were in ecstasies with the great violinist.

Alfred Jaell has commenced his series of concerts in Switzerland, which he is to give in the chief towns successively.

Hans von Bülow has opened trio soirées at Basel.

A commemorative inscription is about to be set up on the house of Beethoven, at Bonn, where, after long research, it has been discovered to be that marked No. 515 of the Bonngasse.

A Conservatorium of Music has been founded in Heidelberg, under the leadership of Capellmeister Sutter.

A new opera by Gustav Härtel, entitled the "Carabineers," is being rehearsed at Schwerin.

Jonchirn, the great violinist, is engaged for six months at Paris, during the Great Exposition, by M. Padeloup. So also is Camilla Urso. Carlotta Patti is engaged by M. Carvalho for the same time.

Second Symphony Concert.

The sun did shine that Friday. Never came a day much finer for the 7th of December. Of course there was a large increase of audience; perhaps, however, with another programme it would have been still larger; for Schumann could scarcely be expected to draw as well as Beethoven; one cannot play his highest trump cards all the time. But these concerts seek to educate as well as charm. While they offer opportunities of hearing and enjoying the familiar, grandest compositions, the prime favorites, like the Beethoven Symphonies, the Mendelssohn and Weber Overtures, they must also introduce to our acquaintance less familiar works of known decided merit. There is always much demand for novelty in every audience; it is too commonly met by shallow novelties, new things of a sensational and questionable character, which run away with idle ears, dissipate the artistic unity of an occasion and unsettle tastes not yet perhaps sufficiently confirmed in the preference of what is best, though capable of becoming so by undistracted hearing of the best. A large proportion of last winter's programmes was composed of Symphonies, Concertos, Overtures, &c., wholly or nearly new to Boston audiences; works by true masters, who had the creative spark in them, though not in the same transcendent degree as Beethoven and Mozart. Thus in the six concerts we had a Symphony and Overture by Schumann wholly new to us; an Overture by Schubert wholly new, and his great Symphony, comparatively so to most hearers; two Overtures by Cherubini, one (to "Anacreon") wholly new, the other (to "The Water Carrier") new to most; the first Symphony by Gade, new to one generation at least of concert-goers; besides several unfamiliar works by masters better known. All these were listened to with pretty general interest and delight last year; among them, the success of the Schumann Symphony was quite remarkable; it was deeply enjoyed by the majority of a large audience, while not a few complained that they could not quite understand it, or that it taxed their attentive faculties too much. Those to whom it had become somewhat familiarized by rehearsal or other study, knew that it was good, that it was music to be welcomed even after Beethoven. Of the "Genoveva" Overture those who had studied it knew that it too was beautiful and worth many a hearing; but it somehow did not seem to pass for its full worth with the audience. The fact that these works had been given once and had begun to be appreciated was in itself good reason for now trying them again; "we desire better acquaintance" of such; and so, after a Beethoven and before a Mozart programme, Schumann came in not unfitly, thus:

Overture: "The Hebrides,".....Mendelssohn.
Piano-forte Concerto, in F minor. (Op. 14,).....Henselt.
Allegro patetico.—Larghetto.—Allegro agitato.
Carlyle Petersilea.

Second Symphony, in C Major, (Op. 61,).....Schumann.
Intro. and Allegro.—Scherzo.—Adagio.—Allegro vivace.
Fantasie Impromptu, in C-sharp minor, (Op. 66.) Chopin.
Carlyle Petersilea.

Overture to "Genoveva,".....Schumann.

The Symphony was certainly the most impressive portion of the concert, and seemed a very earnest, real thing after the more commonplace thoughts of the Concerto by Henselt. The presence of true genius, in one of its great creative efforts, happily inspired too, was unmistakable to most listeners; albeit with the many expressions of satisfaction since there have been mingled some complaints about the difficulty of understanding it, the strain upon the mind, &c. It was so with the yet greater Symphonies of Beethoven upon the first and second hearing. We shall not attempt to add to our former brief description of the work. It is true that there is in the first movement something a little sickly, some spasmodic and some dreamy traits, suggestions of pain and struggle to be sound and well; for, as Schumann said, that movement was composed in a period of illness, and it seems to typify a healthy resolution, summoning up power from the centre, to resist and overcome the flitting pains and wayward fancies of a fevered brain. But it is laid out upon a broad, clear plan, which it develops logically and with commanding power, and it is full of beauties both of melodic thoughts and harmony and instrumental color. The adherence to the one key, or rather the reference and tendency to the C major, throughout all the four movements with but little variation, is characteristic of the work. This in the slow introduction is marked in the bold, firm trumpet and horn tones while the strings move dreamily and sadly, in undertone, groping up into the daylight (the tonic) from the shadows of the subdominant. Again, too, the unity is felt in the way in which the leading themes of the Allegro are foreshadowed in passages of the introduction; indeed the whole Symphony has its germs there. The oftener you listen to that Allegro, the less you feel the sickliness, and the more you enjoy the beauty and splendor of the triumph; the trumpet tones, challenging so boldly in the first bars, carry it.

The second movement is a true Scherzo, still in C, revelling in fine fairy sport, although perpetually modulating, as the leading melodic phrase woven into its whole texture keeps rapidly traversing diminished-seventh intervals. But how cheery those answering calls from flutes above and bassoons below, each in thirds! and how delightfully the latter climb to meet the former sometimes! If the joy is subtle, delicate and dreamy here, it becomes breezy and exhilarating in the triplets of the first Trio, (which returns into the Scherzo); and then a pensive mood comes over the same joy in the second Trio, where the staccato contrapuntal figure of the violas and 'cellos accompanies the even flow of the chief subject; and then how gracefully the moonlight fairy Scherzo theme steals back again!

In the Adagio (which, beginning in C minor, ends in C major) the soul, set free by this magical power of Art in which it has thus far revelled, rises into tranquil ecstasy, "a deep dream of peace," where all is heavenly and beautiful. Possibly the conception is just enough beyond the power of perfect execution in an orchestra, sometimes to disturb the enjoyment a little; we allude to such places as those long climbing trills of the violins upon the very highest notes, which will sound a little shrill and creaky in any short of an ideal performance; but has not the composer a right to claim some ideality of the listener? In the Finale, the spirit rouses itself from the sweet, dreamy rapture of the Adagio into what one of Schumann's biographers calls "a jubilant, heaven-storming happiness." Ganymed-like, you are borne aloft by Jove's strong eagle, and in the full noonday sunshine of C major. The performance of the Symphony was not an ideal one, but it was a very creditable achievement on the part of our orchestra of fifty-two instruments, who all seemed to enter into it con amore.

The "Genoveva" Overture did not gain so much upon the general audience as we had hoped in this second performance. It suffered somewhat by coming last, and particularly by disturbance of the true listening element occasioned by a forced encore of what preceded. But the reason of the indifference lay partly in the work itself; its beauty is of a kind which must be wooed in calm and favorable moments. Its sweets are somewhat cloying, in spite of the breezy horn blasts which now and then freshen up the picture, and relieve brooding solitude and fluttering heartbeats with a fresh odor of the woods.

The best relished of the orchestral pieces (except for the disturbance by late comers) was the "Hebrides" Overture, often called "Fingal's Cave," in which the young Felix wrote out his impressions of the "Einsame Insel" (lonely island) a year or two afterwards, in the month of December, in Rome, where he also finished the "Scotch" Symphony. It was so rendered as to give great delight; and indeed it was the only piece which most could welcome as an old acquaintance in the whole programme.

Henselt's Concerto, as a composition, a musical creation, can bear no comparison with the works in this form (by Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, &c.) which have enriched all the previous Symphony Concerts. It is not without beauties, passing traits of fineness, as in the course of the first movement, and a pervading euphony, at least for the piano part. But the thoughts are for the most part commonplace; its sentimental quality is only better than the average of the better masters of the new Piano virtuosos school; and the instrumentation is often awkwardly managed and sometimes coarse. It is not symphonic, but after all a purely piano-forte piece, a piece for virtuosos. The fact that it is possibly the "most difficult" piece for the executant ever written is rather a left-handed kind of praise. Still it is the work of a musician, one not without poetic quality, one never absolutely trivial. It was a work well worth hearing once in such a concert; the only mistake was in not placing it in another programme where more familiar great works might relieve it. It exhibited young PETERSILIA's playing in a brilliant light. In strength, precision, certainty and fluency of execution, as in well-considered, tasteful light and shade, it places him (so nearly as we can judge between so many marvellous instances of execution which we have heard of late) among the foremost pianists. To thorough technique he adds good intelligence; and his interpretations are clear and elegant, if not particularly sympathetic or inspired, as in the case of the Chopin Impromptu, which was far more enjoyed than the Concerto. We can hardly understand how an artist who is at home in such music, and who finds himself in such a concert, could answer an encore with such a trashy, Gottschalk-y little piece as he did. Probably unwise friends, and not the artist, were the real sinners. To say the least it was a mistake. The encore itself, too, was a violation of the understanding which has ruled in these concerts. The programmes are too long and the character of the pieces such as not to admit of repetitions or insertions without disturbing the unity of the whole. As it was, the Genoveva overture was the sufferer by it. Besides, such an encore lets down the whole tone of the concert, making it an arena for partisan rivalry between the friends of this or that solo pianist. Such calls do not proceed from the real Symphony audience, nor from any but small scattered portions of the crowd. On past occasions there have been plenty who would too gladly have heard more from A and B and C; but these are persons, filled with the spirit of the occasion, appreciating the unity of design in the programme, and who therefore never urge such claims. It is comparatively outsiders who do it, thoughtless of the concert, in their zeal for a friend. It were better to drop out of the Symphony programmes all solo performances, than have it come to this. But we have no fear; the incident was exceptional; the solo artists who have rendered such efficient service in these concerts have done it in a true, self-forgetting spirit, purely to help on the object of the concerts and bring the best works of great authors fairly before a proper public.

The third concert (yesterday) gave Mozart the chief place: Symphony in E flat and "Magic Flute" overture. Mr. ERNST PERABO was the pianist, and played a Concerto by Norbert Burgmüller and Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," op. 13, for piano alone. The closing Overture was the pendant to the "Hebrides," the "Melusina" by Mendelssohn. We have recalled on another page an old description of the "Magic Flute" overture; we here recall part of what Schumann said of the "Melusina":

"To understand it, no one needs to read the long-span, although richly imaginative tale of Tieck; it is enough to know: that the charming Melusina was violently in love with the handsome knight Lusignan, and married him upon his promising that certain days in the year he would leave her alone. One day the truth breaks upon Lusignan, that Melusina is a mermaid—half fish, half woman! The material is variously worked up, in words, as in tones. But one must not here, any more than in the overture to Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' wish to trace so coarse a historical thread all through. (A curious person asked Mendelssohn once, what the overture to Melusina meant; Mendelssohn brusquely answered: 'Hm—a mesalliance!') Always conceiving his subject poetically, Mendelssohn here portrays only the characters of the man and the woman, of the proud, knightly Lusignan and the enticing, yielding Melusina; but it is as if the watery waves came up amid their embraces, and overwhelmed and parted them again. And this revives in every listener those pleasant images by which the youthful fancy loves to linger, those fables of the life deep down beneath the watery abyss, full of shooting fishes with golden scales, of pearls in open shells, of buried treasures, which the sea has snatched from men, of emerald castles towering one above another, &c. This, it seems to us, is what distinguishes this overture from the earlier ones; that it narrates these kind of things quite in the manner of a story, and does not experience them. Hence at first sight the surface appears somewhat cold, dumb; but what a life and interweaving there is down below is more clearly expressed through music than through words.

"The whole begins and ends with a magical wave figure, which emerges several times in the course of the piece; the effect is to transport one, as it were, suddenly out of the battle ground of violent human passions into the vast, earth-surrounding element of the water, particularly from the point where it modulates from A flat, through G, to C. The rhythm of the knight theme in F minor would gain in pride and consequence by a still slower tempo. Right tenderly and clingingly still sounds on in our mind the melody in A flat, behind which we descry the head of Melusina. Of single instrumental effects we still hear the beautiful B flat of the trumpet (near the beginning), which forms the seventh to the chord;—a tone out of the primeval times."

Chamber Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The eighteenth season opened at high tide on Tuesday evening, Dec. 11. Chickering's Hall was overflowing, and some of us had to listen in the ante-room. It brought back the best days of the Club and showed that the interest in them and in the classical chamber music which they have done so much for eighteen years to domesticate among us, is on the increase. The well-known faces were warmly welcomed as they appeared upon the platform. There has been a change, however, in one member; the Club now consists of WM. SCHULTZE (leading violin), CARL MEISEL (second), THOMAS RYAN (tenor), WM. WIESEL (tenor, new), and WULF FRIES, violoncello. This was the bill of fare:

Quartet in B flat. No. 69. Haydn.
Piano Trio, in A Minor. Henselt.
"Legend" for Violin. Wieniawski.
Toccata for Piano, in C. Op. 7. Schumann.
Quintet No. 3, in G minor. Mozart.

The Haydn Quartet was delightful; fresh, wholesome, full of life, of happy inspirations not far-fetched, worked out with clear and facile mastery of form, putting everybody in good humor, and leaving the appetite keen for what should come after. And that is only saying it was Father Haydn. Not to love him is to be unmusical, or musically sophisticated. The instruments were nicely blended, and the beauty of the whole in all its changing moods passed vividly before us. Nor could a fitter pendant be found than the perfect G-minor Quintet of Mozart, which ended the concert with as much zest as it opened.

Mr. PETERSILEA won new laurels by his fine rendering of the Trio by Henselt, a composition which appeared to touch a more responsive chord in the audience than the Concerto by the same. It indulges, to be sure, in the same excess of ornamental arpeggio, continued almost to weariness; but the thoughts seemed fresher and more original; the Andante and the Scherzo were very captivating, and the impression of the whole work pleasing and enlivening. We would hear it more than once before saying more of it. Of the clear, finished execution there could be no question. The Toccata by Schumann is a marvel for difficulty long kept up; but it is also a most interesting work, full of power not soon exhausted. It is like a full stream pouring itself out, with irresistible, free course, leaping over stones and gaining life from every obstacle, true to an innate rhythmic law of form; a glorious, strong, youthful fervor bearing all before it, spending itself lavishly, with a wild freedom, yet with logical consistency and not needing soon to pause. Toccatas are long; so are mountain brooks and rivers. There was no faltering nor exhaustion in the player; he read it clearly, with all ease. Warmly recalled he gave a graceful rendering of Chopin's Berceuse.

Mr. SCHULTZE never seemed to us more happy in his solo-playing; and the "Legend" by Wieniawski, who stands high among the famous violinists of the London concerts of late years, a player of great fire, is one of the most interesting concert pieces of the modern romantic school that we have heard for many a day.

The concert altogether gave rare satisfaction, and augurs a successful season. The next will be on Tuesday evening, Jan. 8.

SCHUBERT MATINEES. The first of six musical feasts announced under this title by the singularly gifted young pianist, ERNST PERABO, took place at Chickering's Hall on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 13, at 3½ o'clock. The audience was excellent in character, of goodly number, though not so large as we had hoped to see. Again we must exclaim, Boston is rich in quite remarkable pianists; none more remarkable, in many capital respects, than this young Mr. Perabo. In the rendering of all kinds of great works by all masters there seems to be no difficulty left for him; he is full of the music and it flows from his fingers, evenly, firmly, strongly, as he quietly sits at the piano, and this in spite of youthful modesty and a nature nervous, introspective to a degree almost painful when he has not music for a medium; for music seems to be his world. The vividness and tenacity of his musical impressions is something extraordinary; there is scarcely any music, Symphony, Concerto, Overture, Sonata, Suite, which he heard well played in Leipzig, which he does not seem ready to reproduce from memory on the piano. With a memory so stored, and coming from Leipzig at a time when all the great repertoire of Beethoven, &c., has been played over and over, till many have become blasés with the best, and eager for novelty, it is perhaps quite natural that he should desire to treat us to things both new and old which few of us have known before. The piano music of Schubert, his dozen or more Sonatas included, is scarcely known to our audiences, and is full of genius; though some of our older artists, no strangers to the Schubert enthusiasm or to all these works, believing them to be very unequal in merit and not as artistic in form as they are richly strown with gems of genius, would not think of making them the staple of a set of concerts. But we, for one, are thankful for a chance to hear them, we who cannot conjure them up under our own hands in private. Mr. Perabo, however, began moderately in respect of Schubert; only one piece in his programme, which was this:

Suite (in D minor). Handel.
Aria, "Cape Fatal Mestria". Centemeri.
Sonata, Op. 123 (four movements). Schubert.
Allegro Moderato. Andante. Minuetto. Allegro Grazioso.
Ave Maria. Kucken.
Sonata in A major (for Violoncello and piano). Beethoven.

The Sonata in E flat is by no means one of the most strikingly characteristic ones of Schubert; it is simply graceful, musical, euphonious, a little commonplace in thought compared with several other of his own and all of Beethoven's, carrying one back almost to the simplicity and easy level of Haydn's. It was most beautifully played, there is no denying.

The Handel Suite, consisting of a Prelude, Fugue, Allerande, Courante, Air with variations and Presto finale, all in one key—it was the wont of those old times—was rendered in such liquid, clear, transparent style, with such an even, finished gloss upon it, that its beauties were brought home to every one. We hope to hear more of Handel's piano music. It may be antiquated, but it is not dry with such an interpreter. The Beethoven Sonata came out with real fire and soul on the part of both performers, WULF FRIES playing the 'cello part exquisitely. This was of course the most enjoyed of all the pieces.

In the young lady who sang, Miss ANNIE MORSE, a debutante, pupil of Mrs. LONG, we were happy to find the presence of a mezzo soprano voice of singularly beautiful quality, rich and musical and well developed, with evidence of more true musical feeling and talent than should be spent on music of so commonplace a character as the two songs she sang.

PARLOR OPERA. Lucia was repeated on the third of the four evenings. We were not present, but take this occasion to correct an error into which we were strangely led in attributing the fine rendering of the obbligato clarinet passage to the veteran James Kendall; the compliment belongs to Mr. LIEBACH, the excellent first clarinet of the Symphony Concerts.—The first season closed on Thursday night with Balfe's "Bohemian Girl."

NEXT IN ORDER. To-day, at noon, the first of HERMANN DAUM's three "BEETHOVEN MATINEES," at Chickering's.

To-morrow (Sunday) evening, the annual Christmas performance of the "Messiah" by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY in full force, with orchestra of the Symphony Concerts and Great Organ. The solos by Miss Houston, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Rametti (who made so promising a debut in St. Paul), Mr. Wm. J. Winch, a fresh young tenor, whose voice and style raised high hopes at the rehearsal, and for basso Mr. J. F. Winch, of whom the like may also be said.—Next Thursday afternoon, Mr. PERABO's second Matinée.

AMERICAN PIANOS IN EUROPE. Without disparaging the remarkable successes of other American makers, we may reasonably feel especial pride in the triumphs of our own Boston "Chickering"—the oldest and, as we truly believe, still the highest name in this branch of American ingenuity and industry. Such "Grands" as this house are now producing we are sure cannot suffer by the side of any competitors. We have little taste for modern advertising methods, least of all for the system of printed recommendations, testimonials, &c., from famous virtuosos, teachers, critics. But certainly, if any names can carry weight with them, it is such as have recently been cited by the Messrs. Chickering. Such names as Moscheles, Reinecke and Plaids, of Leipzig, Halle and Benedict, of London, not to speak of famous London piano makers, like Broadwood, Collard, &c., mean something. And now the Boston piano has found its recognition in Berlin. The Messrs. Chickering publish, with just pride, a letter from the U. S. Consul at Berlin, Mr. Hermann Kreissmann, dated Nov. 8, 1866, of which we copy the essential portion:

GENTLEMEN,—I profit of the opportunity afforded by the return to Boston of my friend, Hugo Leonhard, Esq., the eminent pianist of your city, to do what ought to have been done ere this, acquaint you of the safe arrival of the magnificent "Chickering" Grand Piano, which Mr. Leonhard had been good enough to select for me.

Thanks to your care and foresight it came in perfect order, notwithstanding the frequent handling to which it had necessarily been subjected on its long passage from Boston to Berlin. The instrument, in regard to its elegant and tasteful exterior as well as its beautiful tone and perfect action, is everything that I could have desired.

All those who have seen, heard, examined and played upon it,—among them the very best judges in Berlin, piano players as well as piano makers,—cannot sufficiently admire it, and pronounce it superior to any Grand Pianos, made here or elsewhere in Germany, not excepting the widely and justly celebrated "Bechstein" instruments, of this city. The quality of the tone of your splendid instrument is found to be so refined and pure, it "sings" so beautifully, as the Germans express it, the quantity of its tone is so full, round and ample; the gradation of strength from the lower to the upper registers so complete and even, and its action and mechanism so perfect, that all concur in the opinion that its equal in excellence and perfection has not before been seen in Berlin.

ROCHESTER, N. Y. "Bendel" writes us (Nov. 19): "... Till recently, the musical profession here were not able to keep in advance of the people and the press. This is now happily changed. Our concerts are actually growing too classical for the newspaper critics. Here is a part of the Democrat's 'criticism' on Mr. Appy's last concert:

Upon the whole the concert was a great success; but we must be allowed to express the somewhat unfashionable regret that the performance was so exclusively professional and scientific—that so little attention was given to melody and so much to ornament. The continual din of operatic legerdemain was rather too much for ordinary ears, and we doubt not that the weariness which finally overcame us was shared by others who may be less willing to confess its existence, through fear of being considered old-fashioned and lacking in classical taste. There was very much to admire in the performance; considerable to excite astonishment; but not enough that was simply calculated to please. Wonderful skill was displayed in the orchestral music, but save in the concluding waltz, we failed to hear a single bar of anything that rang like music upon our unpolished tympanum. It was easy to see that the Philharmonics were under most exact and admirable training, but it was not quite so easy to see that any end beside musical discipline was attained.

Mlle. Broussais merited the plaudits which recalled her after playing the "Invitation to the Waltz;" but we are sorry to say that she also seemed to have caught the classical infection, and gave in response another elaborate production, which we, for one, couldn't recognize as embodying anything approaching melody. It was simply an exhibition of skill, like nearly everything else.

"And here is the programme which is so exclusively classical (!):

Overture, Post and Pesant. Suppe. Solo, Piano, Martha, Grande Fantaisie De Concert, Kube, Mlle. C. Broussais. Solo, Violin—Fantaisie Caprice, Vieuxtemps, Henri Appy. Aria—Crispino La Comare, Ricci, Mlle. Clara Strauss. Overture—Martha, Flotow. Solo, Piano—Invitation to the waltz, Weber, Mlle. C. Broussais. Solo, Violin—Anna Bolena—Grand Fantaisie, Alard, Henri Appy. Song—Love's Delight, Abt, Mlle. Clara Strauss. Waltz—L'Africaine, Strauss.

"Surely, to call such a programme classical, shows the education, culture and taste of our daily critic to be anything but educated, and he is morally too far down the musical ladder to ever think of resuscitating.

"The Philharmonic orchestra have made steady improvement since Mr. Appy has had the handling of the baton; yet, without the aid of more professionals, they can never hope to accomplish many deserving things. With the aid of such talent as the Messrs. Schneck, Maying and Mr. Baur, they can do very well, but to rest on their own individual merits, their success musically would be slim indeed.

"We understand that Mr. Tracy, who gave a series of six classical concerts here last winter, embracing the first half of the Beethoven Sonatas, is about ready to commence his second series, which will embrace the last half, including even the most difficult one, op. 106. Mr. Tracy is a quiet, hard working student, deserving of great praise for his efforts in trying to elevate the standard of appreciation amongst us, but from what we hear, see and know, he gets everything but praise from those who should be most willing to award it."

PHILADELPHIA.—Elijah was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society on the 13th inst., at the Academy of Music. The solo parts were sustained by Miss H. M. Alexander, soprano, Miss C. McCaffrey, contralto, Mr. George Simpson, tenor, and Dr. C. A. Guilmette, basso, supported by a fine orchestra and the full chorus of the Society, numbering about three hundred voices, the whole under the direction of Mr. Carl Sents. As compared with the performance of "Elijah" last spring, there were some marked improvements, and some portions unequal to that occasion. Miss Alexander sang altogether better than she did on the previous occasions. She has gained both in voice and style, singing with much more expression and confidence, and showing that most gratifying of all signs in a comparatively inexperienced singer, an ambition and a capacity for improvement, deserving all encouragement. Miss McCaffrey sang as she always does, in a truly artistic method. Her rich, sympathetic contralto never appeared to better advantage, and, as usual, her "O rest in the Lord" was rapturously encored.... The gentlemen did their work in admirable style.... The short solo passages for the "Youth," were assigned to a little girl from the Institution for the Blind, Miss —, with a sweet voice, but whose nervousness evidently prevented her doing herself or her instructor full justice.

The "Angel Trio" was looked for with much interest, as it was announced that three of the boys now in training by Mr. James Pearce, for the choir of St. Mark's Church, would sustain this difficult part. The little fellows, two of whom were scarcely "knee-high to a grass-hopper," undaunted by the novelty of their position or the weight of their responsibility, acquitted themselves very creditably, the second-soprano, especially, possessing a capital voice.... The worst thing in the "Elijah" last night was the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels charge over thee," which was entirely and hopelessly bad.—Eve. Bulletin.

Messrs. Schmitz and Jarvis gave their first "Symphony Concert" last Saturday evening, the main feature being Beethoven's 7th Symphony. Mr. Jarvis has commenced another series of Classical Matinees at the foyer of the Academy, with the aid of Mr. Schmitz and Mr. Gärtner.

The French Opera Company, from New York, have recently played Herold's Zampa at the Philadelphia Academy, with Mlle. Naddie as Camille and M. Armand as Zampa. They have also given Püer's "Le Maître de Chapelle" and Auber's "Crown Diamonds,"—all to enthusiastic audiences.

NEW HAVEN.—The "Mendelssohn Society" performed Elijah on the 12th,—and finely, we are told. Dr. W. D. Anderson conducted. The orchestra was mainly from New York. The choruses were well given, showing improvement over former concerts. The tenor solos were sung by Mr. Arthur Matthison (lately from England) at very short notice, Mr. Perring having a severe cold. Mrs. Cary, of Boston, received an encore in both the contralto airs, and Mrs. H. M. Smith, soprano, and Mr. M. W. Whitney, also, did full justice to their parts. The Angel Trio and the Quartet: "Cast thy burden," &c., were encored.

The King and the Singer,

GERMAN FOLK-SONG.

In the shade of the old cathedral
Two lonely tombs arise;
King Ottmar in one reposes,
In one the singer lies.

Long ago, from a throne ancestral,
The powerful king looked down;
The form on his tombstone carven
Still wears a sword and a crown.

Beside the haughty monarch
Soft sleeps the singer true,
And still, to his breast close folded,
His gentle harp we view.

Castles around are shattered,
Battle-cries fill the land;—
His sword, stone-still, unmoving,
Rests in the monarch's hand.

Odors and pleasant breezes
Wander the vale along;
From the harp of the honored singer
Resounds an immortal song.

Robert Schumann's Compositions.

Extracts (translated for this Journal) from his Biography by WASHINGTON.

The most noteworthy of Schumann's earliest attempts at composition date back to the year 1829, and consist of beginnings of Symphonies; then shorter pieces for the pianoforte, among which some which were afterwards printed in the "Papillons," namely Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6 and 8; and finally Etudes for the piano, invented for the development of his own technique.

The first half of the year 1830 was already more productive. At that time he wrote: Beginnings of a Piano Concerto in F major, Variations upon the name Abegg, and a Toccata in D major.

The "Abegg" variations, which appeared in print as Opus 1 in November, 1831, (Schumann's first published composition), owe their immediate origin to the acquaintance which he made with the beautiful Meta Abegg at a ball in Mannheim. She was the daughter of a high official in that city. According to Schumann's own account, she was the dear idol of one of his friends; and there is no ground for seeking any deeper meaning, such as has been variously hinted, in the whole affair. Besides the wish to please a friend and celebrate the fair one in a composition, it was mainly the capacity of the name Abegg for musical treatment that interested him to clothe it in tones. The theme is founded on the notes a, b-flat, e, g, g, showing the following well-sounding melodic figure:

which, continued in like manner, gradually falling, in four-fold subdivision, forms the first part of the theme. In the second part then follows an inversion of the preceding figure. The variations, only half of which, three in number, are printed, and these followed by a Finale, although of an unusual style even from the second one, and already breathing the Schumann spirit, are in themselves without any especial musical importance. In fact they can only pass for dilettante-ish evidences of a remarkably gifted nature; nor could it well be otherwise with Schumann's entire want of theoretic knowledge. The most prominent defect is the unsatisfactory mastery of the material—the greatest enemy to enjoyment.

The dedication of this work to the "Comtesse Pauline von Abegg" is fictitious, as what we have just told clearly shows. As Schumann had reasons for not dedicating his composition to the lady who had prompted it, he resorted to this assumed inscription in order to furnish some sort of motive for the publication of what was unmistakably an occasional composition.

About the Toccata, which afterwards underwent a complete remodelling before its publication, we will speak further on.

During the year 1830, Schumann left Heidelberg and returned to Leipzig, where he continued to work upon the never finished Piano Concerto in F major.

The year 1831 brought forth a work, which was afterwards published as Op. 2. It consists of 12 little movements, some of which had already been written in Heidelberg, bearing the name "Papillons." Schumann loved a certain mystical symbolism, a veiled hinting at general poetic intention, as so many of his later piano compositions testify. This mystical symbolism is to be regarded as the product of that sickly romanticism which strives to express poetic combinations of ideas with an intellectual profundity of style, without attaining to the plastic clearness and the simple truth of sensuous manifestation, whereby these ideas may become immediately intelligible to those who are expected to enjoy them. Certainly the name "Papillons" has a deeper mystical sense; but we will not attempt to pre-occupy any one's judgment by a conjectural interpretation.

The "Papillons," dedicated to Schumann's three sisters-in-law, Theresa, Emilie and Rosalie, to all of whom he was bound by ties of tenderest friendship, are aphoristic tone-sentences or little snatches without any peculiar artistic value, and only in so far of interest as they reveal a series of contrasted moods, in which we may already recognize a kind of musical expression which is characteristic of Schumann. Somewhat more carried out and more attractive than the rest, however, is the "Finale," through its combination of the "grandfather's dance"* with the first piece, whose melodic figure appears in the upper part, while the said dance forms the bass. In a grammatical point of view the whole work betrays, like the "Abegg" Variations, a helpless awkwardness explainable by want of acquaintance with the art of composition. Everywhere you feel the almost utterly fruitless struggle of the ingenious musical thought with the form. Some felicitous details are obviously far more the consequence of musical instinct than of a conscious, clear perception expressing itself with certainty.

That Schumann based the "Papillons" on a poetic design appears from a letter to his friend Henrietta Voigt, written in 1834. He there says: "I could tell you much about it, if Jean Paul had not done it better. If you have a moment to spare, I beg you to read the last chapter of the 'Flegeljahre,' where it all stands in black and white even to the giant's boot in a sharp minor. (At the conclusion of the Flegeljahre it seems to me as if the piece were essentially over and yet the curtain did not fall).—I will only mention further, that I have put the text to the music, and not the reverse." . . .

Besides finishing the "Papillons," Schumann in the course of the year 1831 wrote the first movement of a Sonata in G minor (afterwards, according to his own statement, in the Compositions-übersicht, printed under the title of Allegro as *Op. 7**), and Variations on an original Theme in G major. The latter remain unknown. The Sonata movement (if by that is to be understood the Allegro published as Op. 8), belongs, both in regard to form and matter, among Schumann's weakest productions. In its broad, formless redundancy, this piece of music is unquickenng, and in the want of all clear, masterly presentation it gives no room for sympathy. Schumann himself expresses himself laconically about it, when he writes to his friend Henrietta Voigt, Nov. 24, 1834, "that the composer is worth more than his work, and less than the lady to whom it is dedicated."

[About this time, at the age of 22, Schumann for the first time seriously devoted himself to the study of Counterpoint and the laws of Composition. The laming of a finger by excessive practice had disabled him permanently for an executive pianist.]

1832. This year he produced: "Intermezz" for the piano, printed as Op. 4 in two sets, and the first movement of a forgotten Symphony for Orchestra in G minor. To this time also belongs the Transcription for piano of those 6 Violin Caprices of Paganini, which were published as Op. 3.

The Intermezz, six in number, claim far more musical interest than his op. 1 and 2, inasmuch as they contain original, complete and more comprehensive pictures suited to the lyric forms. They also betray single instances of peculiarly moulded harmony and rhythm, which belong only to Schumann, without, after all, either in their totality as music pieces, or in their outward sonority, leaving a feeling of satisfaction. The melodic formations show themselves by far the weakest,—a proof that the primitive plastic power had always been comparatively less exercised and developed. One reason may have been, that Schumann, as he himself confessed, was in the habit of composing at the piano,—a habit which necessarily restrains one's inward shaping and creation. Schumann persisted in this manner of composing until the time of his "Paradise and the Peri." How far actual life mingled as a determining factor in this work appears from No. 2 of the 1st Set of Intermezzi, at the middle and end of which are attached the significant words: "Meine Ruh ist hin" (My peace is gone!) . . .

The Transcription of the Paganini Caprices (Nos. 5, 9, 13, 19, 16, and the introduction to No. 11, of the original edition) is a work which shows throughout the just and noble feeling Schumann had for the comprehension of the works of others. What these Caprices lose and necessarily must lose in characteristic quality by being transferred to the piano, is made good by the natural tact with which they are harmonized, each in conformity with the fundamental character of the particular Caprice. It should not seem strange that the harmonic treatment here shows far more fluency and ease than Schumann's original compositions of the same period; for in the one case he had only to fill out and adapt the fitting harmony to music made already to his hand; whereas in his own ideal world he had to mould and clarify material, to the mastery of which he had by no means fully grown up.

Schumann attached some value to this work as a study; it surely was of use to him as such. In a somewhat lengthy Preface, which already contains an allusion to Mendelssohn, he sets forth the end and motive of this labor.

The above named works claimed Schumann's time and energies until the winter of 1832, when he paid a visit to his home in Zwickau. One object with him was to have his newly written Symphony movement tried by the orchestra of his native town, that he might hear it with the bodily ear, as Leipzig offered him no chance for that. But the matter did not rest with a mere rehearsal; the piece was publicly performed, and in a concert given (Nov. 18) in Zwickau by Clara Wieck, then thirteen years of age. After this he spent a short time alternately in Zwickau and the neighboring mountain town of Schneeberg, occupied with composition and particularly with zealous study of Counterpoint and of Sebastian Bach. He wrote also some shorter pieces for the piano, especially some movements afterwards printed in the "Album Leaves," op. 124, as: Impromptu, Scherzino, Burlesque, Larghetto and Waltzes; besides a second and third part to the Symphony in G minor.

1833. Return to Leipzig in the Spring. The first work of this year was the second set of Paganini's Violin Caprices, published as Op. 10. These are treated with far more freedom than those of the preceding year. Especially are Nos. 12, 6, 10, 4, 2 and 3, of the original edition, commended to piano-players.

Next follow the Impromptus for piano. They first appeared under the title: "Impromptus sur une Romance de Clara Wieck pour le Piano-forte, Oeuv. 5. Dediés à Monsieur Fr. Wieck. Publié 1833, Août." At their foundation lies, as the inscription tells, a Romanza, or rather a simple Theme by Clara Wieck, published a short time before by her, with Variations, as Op. 3. The working up of this Theme was an attractive task for Schumann, considering the lively interest (perhaps at that time a purely artistic one) which he took in Clara. He wrote upon it 11 different movements, which might have been called not so much Impromptus as "Variations in free style," since they are in fact, on the one hand, too much worked out for Impromptus, by which one commonly understands free improvisations, while on the other hand they for the most part adhere strictly to the theme.

The beginning is original enough, the bass, which is set beneath the theme, parading throughout as solo. The variations appear, after the theme has entered, with interweaving and under-building of the theme, as well as of its bass, in variously contrasted play of moods; everywhere revealing a luxurious fancy, whose over-rich imagery injures the objective clearness. On the whole there is no mistaking a technical progress, as well as an ever more decided and more vigorous breaking through of the Schumann idiom against the earlier compositions; although there are still various hardnesses and violent, abrupt modulations, in which one easily feels the want of formal mastery. That the moonlight nights of Riedel's garden (where he lived) with its nightingales play now and then a part in the music, one who has any acquaintance with Schumann's poetizing way will remark in the 10th Variation, an uncommonly imaginative piece.

The date affixed to the title has no other object but to fix the time of publication, as it is always done with books. Schumann thought that musical publications ought to be dated, and wished to introduce the practice. . . .

The new edition of this work, edited by Schumann himself some ten years later, varies in many respects from the first. Not only does it contain essential improvements in the harmony, but two of the variations (one of which is the tenth, one of the most interesting) are entirely omitted, while only the third is replaced by a new one. Finally the conclusion of the whole has undergone an important alteration. For the musician a minute comparison of the two editions is particularly interesting, since it shows how and in what degree the composer in the course of years had changed his views.

Schumann further undertook a working over of the Toccata composed in Heidelberg, as appears by the transposition from the original key in D major into that of C major; he also made the first sketches for his piano Sonatas in G minor (op. 22) and in F-sharp minor (op. 11). The Toccata, published as op. 7, was probably suggested by a piece of the same name by Czerny (op. 92), to which in the beginning, but there only, it bears a remote resemblance. Like this, in a rather comprehensive compass, it is kept in the Etude style, without much claim to any special value in point of invention. It seems to have been mainly designed for technical ends, as appears from an expression of Schumann's in his Neue Zeitschrift, Vol. 4, page 183, where he says that "it is perhaps one of the most difficult of piano pieces."—Finally, we may mention, as belonging to this year, two sets of Variations on the "Sehnsuchts Waltz" by Schubert, and on the Allegretto in Beethoven's A-major Symphony. Neither of them have become known.

Gothic architecture also, in its origin, was devoted exclusively to the services of religion. The nobility and rich laity lived in rude habitations destitute of all artistic embellishments, at a time when the great cathedrals, with windows of gorgeous colors and carvings of exquisite beauty, were erected and consecrated to the Church. It was not ignorance of art, but a sense of its sacredness, that lavished so much wealth and taste on the religious edifice, whilst the walls of the house were left bare. But with the rise of feudalism the castle began to adorn itself with the spoils of the cathedral, just as the palaces and villas of the Roman Emperors rivalled the temples in architectural grandeur, so soon as those Emperors usurped the attributes of deities.

Thus we find that all art originates in reverence of feeling, and aims at religious edification. It is typical, not transcriptive; and, like an alphabet, uses forms as signs of ideas, not as mere ornaments or imitations of things in nature. From this point of view, we appreciate at once its value as a permanent and impartial record of the human race. Every monument of art is an historical document. Temples and cathedrals are chronicles in stone, primitive books in which letters and syllables of marble are linked with words and phrases of granite into the most gigantic combinations of thought. Such are Karnac and that Titanic plagiarism, St. Peter's, in which Michel Angelo piled the Pantheon on the Parthenon. The first letter in this early alphabet of architecture was a simple monolith, or perhaps a single stone set upright with a huge rock on the top forming a T. Such are the Cyclopean literatures of Asia and Europe, the most ancient monuments of Mexico and South America, and the prehistoric sculptured stones which the Druids have left scattered over the moors of Northumberland. Each was the symbol of a thought, the centre of a group of ideas, the utterance of a sacred language, the mystic record of an occult philosophy and cosmogony; and in the multiplication and combination of these detached monoliths we can trace the progress of columnar architecture through all its phases, from the rude cairn to the graceful colonnade; in fact, the Doric peristyle is only a revised edition of the Celtic cromlech.

The fundamental styles of architecture are very few, they can be counted on the fingers. By fundamental we mean founded on a single idea, to which all the details are subordinate. All other styles are secondary, inasmuch as they are formed from the union of two or more ideas, and are for the most part only adaptations of architecture to secular purposes, in which the symbolical significance is lost sight of; so that, according to the strict definition, they are not styles of architecture at all, but mere fashions of ornamental stone-masonry. These it is no profanation to put to secular uses; indeed, it is their proper office. On the contrary, there can be no greater incongruity than to bring any of the primary forms of architecture into juxtaposition with warehouses, railway-stations, or any of the associations of trade. What can be more absurd than an exchange for bulls and bears built in the Gothic style, a custom-house in the style of the Parthenon, or a Greek cornice over the shop-window of a greengrocer! You might as reasonably transfer the miniature paintings of an old Italian missal to the pages of a ledger, or adorn the periphery of a millstone with the reliefs which Phidias sculptured on the sandals of Minerva.

The most prominent of these fundamental forms of architecture are the Oriental, the Grecian, and the Gothic. The first (of which Hindu and Egyptian may be taken as representatives) symbolizes weight; the second signifies support; the third expresses ascension. These three ideas graven in architecture correspond to the three mental stages of sensuality, intellectuality, and spirituality; so that in each of the triad is reflected the peculiar character of the religion and the civilization which produced it. There is no material form so suggestive of weight as the pyramid, or the cone, which is essentially the same. It is the form which all loose particles of solid matter on the surface of the earth assume under the action of the law of gravitation. The pyramid is the nucleus of all Egyptian architecture; the whole structure (cornice, doors, mouldings, even to the decorations) is composed of pyramids or segments of pyramids. The same form was given to the apex of the obelisk which stood in front of the temple, like a giant finger pointing to the sky for the key of its hieroglyphic mysteries. This sense of weight, of massive and gloomy duration, is intensified by the narrowness of the intercolumniation. The pillars with bulging bases are set as thick as possible; it would seem as if only a mountain-chain of granite were a fit burden for them; yet there is in reality no immense superstructure requiring for its support such an excessive outlay of strength. It did not then spring from a material necessity, but was employed to express a fundamental idea. In what more concentrated formula could it be embodied than in these huge masses of the quarry, endowed with the sluggish life of the crocodile and the Nile-plant? We read the same thought in the features of that slowly living rock, the giant Sphinx, whose sad and peaceful eyes have watched the fitting of a hundred generations of men; in the colossal ruins of Persepolis; in the theocratic masonry of India, the vast excavated temples of Ellora and Elephanta, written over with mythological and allegorical sculpture, in which are represented the divine energies and attributes according to the Braminical theology. In these structures, not less clearly than on the pages of the Veda, are inscribed caste, immobility, pantheism. They are the symbols of a being in whose immensity all personalities are merged, all human force and faculty are lost,—of a deity identified with the universe, whilst men

"Are but organic harps diversely framed
That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps,
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the soul of each and God of all."

In Grecian architecture the column is the most conspicuous feature, and has a right to this prominence from the fact of its being the principal supporting member of the edifice. The wall, so far as it exists, serves only as a veil to the interior, and as to any office it performs in upholding the building, instead of resting on the basement it might as well have been suspended from the entablature. The elements of this style in its simplest expressions are the post and the lintel. They convey the idea, not of weight merely, but of weight well sustained; in other words, not gravitation, but the capability of resisting it. Without specifying, we may say that this idea enters into all parts of the structure: the elliptical flutings, and the graceful curvature or entasis of the Doric shaft, the inward inclination of the axes of the outer columns, the gentle swell of the stylobate or basement, all carry out the fundamental idea of symmetrical and elastic strength.* It is the symbol of serene and conscious power, the type of the Greek intellect, the embodiment of law and order as well as of grace and beauty, the highest expression of an ideal humanity. Compared with Oriental architecture, the Hellenic temple is an advance from the dark rock to the pure crystal, from the coal to the diamond, from the worship of nature to the deification of man. The best representative of this style is the Doric Parthenon, erected about 437 B. C. on the site of the older temple which was burnt by the Persians. It was built wholly of Pentelic marble by the architects, Kallikrates and Iktinos, under the presiding genius of Phidias. Nothing could better express the fine balance of the Greek mind, and the quiet spirit of beauty that shed its influence over Grecian life, than the perfect symmetry of this fair house of columns. In its external history also is mirrored the history of the Hellenic race. For nine hundred years it stood on the sunny brow of the Acropolis, far above the daily turmoil of the lower city, a sublime and perpetual offering to the tutelary goddess of Athens. During the fifth century of our era it was transformed into a Christian church, and for more than a thousand years the Virgin Mary sat in the seat of the virgin Minerva. It then became a Turkish mosque, and remained consecrated to the service of Mohammed so long as the Greeks themselves were the slaves of the Moslem power. On the 28th of September 1687, a shell was thrown into it by the Venetian general, the Count of Königsmark, who was besieging the citadel. The Turks had converted the temple into a powder-magazine, which of course rendered the destruction of the edifice more complete. Since that day it has been plundered by every antiquarian adventurer, as Greece herself has been the prey of every nation. Now it stands a magnificent ruin, serving as a storehouse for the preservation of other ruins,—a fit image of the whole Grecian peninsula.

The fundamental idea of Gothic architecture is weight, not supported merely, but annihilated. The constructive significance of the building centres in the keystone of the arch. By this means it is supported from above, the very downward pressure inherent in the masses upholds them, and the tall pile

"By its own weight stands steadfast and immovable;"

* Penrose ascertained by accurate measurement that the stylobatic swell of the Parthenon was four inches for the length (227 feet), and three inches for the breadth (101 feet); and that concentric inclination of the columns (65 feet high) was one and a half inches. Thus, by obeying a nice law of optics, the structure was relieved of the dead, sagging heaviness which a perfectly horizontal base and vertical shafts would have inevitably produced. This is the reason of the advice given to the architect by Vitruvius (III. 4. 5): "Stylobata ita oportet exaequare, ut habeat per modum adjectionem per scissiles impares, si enim stylobata ad libellam dirigatur, alveolatus oculo videbitur."

the law of gravity is suspended or counteracted by vital force; the vaulted roof and storied arches seem hung in the air, and solid matter is endowed with the utmost lightness and aeriality. Thus the whole edifice expresses, not counterpoise, but ascension, aspiration,—spire, tower, buttress, clear-story, and pinnacle all rise to heaven, and indicate the spirituality of the worship to which they are devoted. This airy effect is increased by the numerous openings, lancet, trefoil, and rosette, which perforate the sides, transforming them into walls of many-colored windows. The cella of the Greek temple is small and extremely simple in ornamentation, but around it are open corridors richly adorned with statues and reliefs. Thus its beauty is wholly external. On the contrary, the inner walls of the Christian church are large and lofty, and the spaces covered with paintings and sculpture. The Greek architecture is clear, symmetrical, objective, and wonderful in unity, like a tragedy of Aeschylus; the Gothic is the fruit of a fuller consciousness and a deeper spirituality, manifesting a more richly developed individuality, and unfolding in an infinite variety. The cathedrals of the Middle Ages are the embodiment of an ecclesiastical inspiration animating a whole people, and owe their origin to that excess of religious zeal which found another and wider outflow in the Crusades. From the fact that they rose like an exhalation over all Europe soon after the first Crusade, historians have endeavored to trace a connection between them and the East, and have rummaged the ruins of Persia and India to find some evidence that the Oriental nations were acquainted with the use of the pointed arch. A little attention to the psychology of art would have prevented this error. Gothic architecture is connected with the Crusades only as an expression of the same spiritual enthusiasm.

The progress of science and civilization consists in this, that every idea disappears in a higher idea. A new thought reveals itself, and the world that seemed so fixed becomes fluid again, and takes another shape as it spins around the axis of this new thought. The discovery of a simple hydrostatic principle rendered superfluous the stupendous masonry of Roman aqueducts. They were built to weather the assaults of ages, but they were all toppled down by the breath of one thinking man. Thus one art overturns another. During the Middle Ages the ascendant art was architecture, including, as subordinate branches, sculpture, which chiselled the portals, and painting, which illuminated the windows. All the intellectual and æsthetic energy of the age converged to this one point. The stuff that now makes the poet then made the architect, the sculptor, or the painter. The inspiration which now produces a book then produced a building. The thinker, unwilling to intrust his thoughts to the fleeting breath of a wandering minstrel, or to a perishable manuscript, which few had either the ability or opportunity to read, wrote them on enduring tablets of stone, and lifted them up before the eyes of men. In this literature of the quarry, Abelard's free-thinking found utterance, as well as Hildebrand's hierarchy. Every change of public opinion and all social and political revolutions are recorded here. Even the scepticisms and heresies that crept into the Church are sculptured on its walls and over its portals, in chisellings as caustic as the epigrams of Rabelais or the drops that flowed from the pen of Erasmus.* But when Gutenberg invented moveable types, and in company with John Faust established his little printing press at Mentz, in the year 1450, the life of architecture went out. It is easier to print a word than to hew a stone, to shape a sentence than to erect a column, to publish a book than to put in motion tons of material for the purpose of translating a thought into a building. Besides, the ubiquity of the printed page more than compensates for the durability of the sculptured stone. The paper leaves that fly abroad and fill the earth are more imperishable than piles of solid masonry. A second irruption of barbarians might blot out forever the famous stunze of Raphael, and obliterate the cycles of Sibyls and prophets culminating in "The Last Judgment," in which Michel Angelo has traced the origin, growth, and final dispensation of theocracy; but the thought once impressed on the printed page is not subject to such contingencies; it is "exempt from the wrong of time and capable of perpetual renovation." Thus the craft of the printer, by furnishing the readiest mode of utterance, and, at the same time, the best means of preserving the thing uttered, superseded the primitive didactic vocation of the artist; henceforth his function was to adorn the doctrine which he had hitherto been required to teach.

However beneficial the invention of printing may have been to the advancement of science and the spread of civilization, it necessarily exerted an influence unfavorable to art, and especially to architecture. Architecture coming in conflict with it made a desperate struggle for life. It went back to Rome and Greece, and engrafted classic on Christian art, producing the period known as the Renaissance, which afterwards degenerated into the Rococo and Periwig of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But it was in vain. All the past could not save it. It is virtually dead, and we shall never build cathedrals so long as we can print cyclopedias. There has been no great architecture since the sixteenth century. The last of the giant builders was Michel Angelo, who died in 1564, the year in which Shakespeare was born; and even he expressed himself in this form less freely than his predecessors. With the same cubic feet of material, Brunelleschi of the fifteenth century is grander than Michel Angelo of the sixteenth. Compare the dome of Santa Maria dei Fiori in Florence with that of St. Peter's in Rome, and the former displays a deeper intelligence and a finer flow of originality. In the latter, the sublime is to a great degree lost in the more stupendous. The only great attempt at Gothic architecture in the present century—the New Palace of Westminster—is a most signal failure. In comparison with the old Abbey that stands near it, it is an empty and frivolous gewgaw; and yet the Abbey itself is far inferior to the great cathedrals of the Continent. The profusion of ornament which Sir Charles Barry lavished on the edifice could not hide its real decrepitude. It does not enkindle the faintest spark of creative interest. It is the cold mechanical imitation of what ceased to be an inspiration more than three centuries ago, the hollow mask moulded on the face of a dead civilization. It is "a monument of Gothic art" in a far different sense from that in which the guide-books employ those words.

Schumann in England.

We have cited several London concert criticisms of late to show that the bitter anti-Schumannism there so long prevailing is fast giving way. Here is another, from the Daily News (Dec. 4). It forms part of a review of one of the "Monday Popular Concerts."

Robert Schumann, born in 1810, produced, during a life of little more than forty years, a vast number of works in all forms and styles of the art, both vocal and instrumental, besides having been active as a writer of elaborate criticisms on the works of other masters. His early musical studies were not very systematic, and it may be questioned whether a genius so special as his would have found its best and most natural development under the conventional conditions of the recognized systems of the period. Beethoven and Schubert were the composers who chiefly influenced Schumann in the formation of his style—the grandeur and elevated sublimity of the one, and the tender dream fancy of the other having had greater charms for Schumann than the more definite forms of beauty, and more regularly proportioned and symmetrical arrangement of details that characterized the music of Mozart, the safest of all models for the student who is not endowed with individuality of genius sufficient to justify a departure from established forms and precedents. Whether Schumann had this degree of original power has long been a moot point with musical critics, some having denied it with a rancour and acrimony that are happily seldom now found in art controversy. Others, on the contrary, have gone just as much too far in the opposite direction, and have injured their own cause by claiming for Schumann a position above that of Mendelssohn, and even equal to that of Beethoven. The fact is that Schumann was a man of fine, but unequal genius, with a tendency to the abstract and ideal; frequently striving after a degree of sublimity and grandeur that he was unable to obtain, and becoming in consequence sometimes vague and obscure in his more ambitious works. With all these occasional faults, however, his music generally contains so much that is admirable, that his works should be judged by their own standard, and not by any unfair comparison with the gigantic productions of Beethoven, or even with the finished and maturely considered compositions of Mendelssohn. That Schumann possessed a genius of a fine, if not of the highest, order, is sufficiently evidenced by many of his songs, much of his pianoforte music, and portions of his larger compositions, such as his four orchestral symphonies, and his cantata, "Paradise and the Peri." But his dispassionate admirers must admit that, in most of his elaborate pieces, such as those last cited, he is occasionally diffuse and labored, prolonging the work beyond his power of sustaining the interest of its development. Sometimes, too, his themes are too trite for lengthy treatment in a work of grand design—for instance, in the first and last allegros of his fourth (and best) symphony. Yet this very symphony contains much charming, and some powerful, writing—especially the "Romanze," which forms the middle movement, the minuet and trio; besides other portions of the work. His other three symphonies also contain many beauties with intervals of labored dullness. The effect created by his pianoforte concerto when played by Madame Schumann at one of the Philharmonic concerts last year, and again, when subsequently played by Herr Jaell at one of the New Philharmonic concerts, will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it on either occasion, and must have gone far to remove some of the unjust prejudice arising from the almost universal tone of disparagement, in some cases of contempt, in which English critics have spoken of Schumann's name. No doubt some of his larger works are occasionally wearisome from causes above alluded to, and from the frequent prevalence of a gloomy tone in these more elaborate compositions. Yet there are many instances, especially in his smaller pianoforte pieces, of a fine and subtle humor, such as none but a man of genius could have possessed. For proof of this let any one refer to his "Humoreske" (Op. 20), "Novelletten" (Op. 21), "Faschingschwank aus Wien" (Op. 26), "Wald-scenen" (Op. 82), among many other of his numerous pianoforte pieces. Had he written only the few works just mentioned, Schumann would deserve more respectful consideration than he has hitherto received in this country; and we are glad to find that there is a growing tendency to produce, and an increasing disposition to listen to, his music, nearly all of which is worth a hearing, and much of it deserving a frequent association with classical productions. The trio performed last night for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts is the first of three similar works by Schumann. It has many of his characteristic beauties, with some of his equally characteristic defects. The first movement is full of gloomy grandeur, with passages of vigorous energy that few other pianoforte writers have surpassed. The scherzo has much quaintness and animation. The slow movement contains some passages of dreamy fancy, but has a general character of vagueness and laborious effort. The best portion of the whole trio is the finale, in which the interest is sustained throughout with masterly power. Breadth of style, brilliant passage writing, and grandeur of climax are all to be found here. The passage of eight bars of chords in minima (near the close) is as grand as it is characteristic of Schumann. To condemn altogether (as it has been too much the fashion) such a work by such a writer on account of some incidental defects, is about as philosophical as it would be to decry a fine picture because perhaps an arm is a little out of drawing, or the perspective not quite true. The trio was very finely played, and so well received as to justify further productions from the same source. The "Abendlied," an adaptation of one of Schubert's "Lieder," pleased so much as to be re-demanded. Signor Piatti gave it with true vocal expression.

Adrien-Francois Servais.

A loss, the importance of which can scarcely yet be estimated, and which, to the Conservatory of Music in Brussels, is all but irreparable, has fallen on musical art abroad. Adrien-Francois Servais, one of the most notable violoncellists of this or any time, died on Monday the 26th November, at nine o'clock in the morning, at Hal, his native town, aged fifty-nine years and ten months. The art-journals of France and Belgium are eloquent in deploring a death so lamentable in the cause of art; and M. Fétis père has taken occasion to remind the world of the great ability which it has lost in the death of a clever artist. "His death," says Fétis, "is a grief for his colleagues, his pupils, his numerous friends, for the little town where he was born, for all Belgium even, for no one was more popular in the land. By his good nature, by his simplicity, by the constancy of his attachment for old friends, he earned pardon for the superiority of his talent—a rare exception among those who raise themselves above the vulgar."

The life of Servais was that of an energetic spirit. Son of a poor church musician, he learned from his father the elements of solfeggio and the violin. The Marquis de Sayve—the eldest brother of that Sayve, Count Auguste de la Croix Chevrete, an amateur composer whose symphonies and concertos for stringed instruments are published in Germany and show the possession of talent—discovered the young Servais' musical bias at an early stage, and entrusted him to the care of Vander Francken, first violin at the Brussels theatre, and a good professor. But the violin was not the young professor's speciality. The revelation came to him after hearing Platel, an original and talented artist on the violoncello. The pleasure which he experienced was so strong, that he threw up his former instrument and adopted the 'cello. Admitted into the Conservatoire of Brussels, he took lessons from the same Platel, who was also the master of Dumanek and Batta. It was no easy matter for young Servais, who lived in his father's house at Hal, to attend the lessons of the Conservatoire.

At that time the railway did not exist: a single diligence, lumbering up from Paris, passed through the little town during the night and arrived at Brussels at five o'clock in the morning. Even this poor transport was denied the young artist, who was too poor to pay his fare. But Servais scorned difficulties; thrice a week, in all weathers, he made the journey—thirty kilometres, there and back—on foot, his basso in its heavy case strapped to his back. A year passed in this courageous fashion, at the end of which time he had out-stripped his schoolmates and earned the first prize for violoncello at the competition. Then an engagement for the orchestra of the theatre fell to him, where he took his seat by his master's side. Three years more, and he was still hard at work—not yet recognized, however—not yet famous—for musical taste had not yet arisen in Brussels. In 1833 M. Fétis arrived to assume the direction of the Conservatoire, and Adrien-Francois consulted him as to his future. Fétis recommended Paris, and gave him letters of introduction. To Paris Servais accordingly went, was heard, welcomed, and admitted at once into the first rank of instrumentalists of his order. Not yet, however, had he attained the perfection of mechanism to which his later studies brought him.

In 1834 he came to London and played at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Returning to Belgium, he gave himself anew to the study of mechanism: and soon after, his first compositions appeared. In 1836, he again visited Paris, and next year journeyed through Holland. That journey was a succession of triumphs, and the press of Germany began to notice the rising artist. Two years later, and Servais' presence and fame reached Russia.

It is needless to follow him in his pilgrimage through the countries of Europe and Asia—Poland, Bohemia, Austria, Prussia, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Siberia—or to speak of the transports of enthusiasm that greeted him everywhere. The talent of Servais is too well known to call for recapitulation. In the year of tottering monarchies and new dynasties, in 1848, he attained the chair at the Brussels Conservatoire, where for eighteen years he has been occupied in turning out many distinguished pupils who are now transmitting the traditions of his school in his country and to the foreigner. Endowed with a vigorous constitution he seemed likely to live to an advanced age; but an unfortunate journey to Russia last winter induced the breaking up of that strong and healthy nature. Sudden chills have produced death ere now in Russia. Servais caught cold on his way between St. Petersburg and Moscow; but it was not until after his return to Belgium that the effects became transparent. "Towards the last days of April," says his friend M. Fétis, "I was seized with pain on seeing him enter my study: it was only the ghost of his former self, and I could not doubt the approach of the end. His thinness increased every day, and his strength diminished in the same proportion. He seemed to cheer up on the approach of the competition, through the care he bestowed on his favorite pupils, his son, aged 16, and young Fischer, son of the chapel-master of Sainte-Gudule, both of whom gained the first prize between them. During the holidays the disease undermining the life of Servais continued its ravages. On the re-opening of the classes he wished to resume his professional functions, and managed to give a few lessons, but his strength was exhausted: he took to his bed and never rose again.

The funeral of the great artist, which took place on the Thursday following his death at Hal, offered a sight unknown in the annals of music. Trains from Paris, Mons, Namur, and Charleroi poured into the little town crowds of the friends and admirers of Servais—the student body who owed their knowledge to him, artists of all ranks and kinds, members of various musical societies, literary men, authors, journalists, and foreigners. The shops were shut as at a public calamity: most of the houses were hung with black; wax lights flamed in funeral fashion everywhere. The population of Hal lined the streets as the cortège passed, and shed tears. The poor of the town knew what a benefactor they had lost in Servais. The funeral service was very beautiful; the church crowded with notabilities. The discourses held over his remains in the cemetery, after the French and Belgian fashion, left not an eye dry.

We cannot do better than quote the eulogium of his friend M. Fétis, to whom we are indebted for many of the facts of Servais' life. "Possessing the finest tone, the most powerful, the most sympathetic, which ever violoncellist had, not excepting even Romberg, whom I heard in his best time; having an incomparable cleverness of mechanism, in which his left hand and his bow displayed equal aptitude; he attached great value, in the latter part of his career, to delicacy of shading. It is no exaggeration to say that he caused you frequently to forget his instrument, and fancy you only heard the sweet voice of some great singer. Servais did not distinguish himself alone in instruction by his profound knowledge of the mechanism of his instrument, by his perfect appreciation of correctness, and by the transmission of his fine quality of tone; he had more, that rare gift of magnetic excitement which drives pupils beyond the point where they seem as if they ought to stay: a supreme professorial quality which only exists where there is union of natural energy with superiority of talent. I have only known it at its highest degree in two great artists—Garat and Mme. Pleyel. Servais, as I before said, had also the gift. Who will fill the void caused by his death?"—Orchestra.

Humbug

By the publication of an article entitled "Schwindel," in its number of the 10th October, the Neue New-Yorker Musik-Zeitung gives us fresh proof of its really sincere endeavor to advance the cause of music in North America, for it attacks without pity the humbug which reigns in musical matters as well as in everything else there. We are accustomed, in Europe, to look down with contempt upon the American system of advertisements and criticisms, and it certainly deserves our contempt to the fullest extent. But let us conscientiously see whether all that we condemn over there is never found at home. We will put the means of instituting this self-examination within the power of our readers by quoting from the article in question certain passages, the application of which to similar things in Europe will not be difficult:—

"Every one knows that these barefaced laudations are directly opposed to the truth; everyone laughs, but appears to regard this humbug as a kind of necessity to be endured without murmuring. The press more particularly seems to misunderstand what it ought to do in this case. It seems to have no idea of anything like a proper principle of criticism. It measures by the standard of friendship, of personal good-feeling, or perhaps something worse. It appears to be considered a sort of necessity, an understood agreement to praise certain persons, and to find fault with others. It must not be thought that something like bribery always lies at the bottom of this. We know artists who do not adopt that means, and who enjoy the never-varying favor of the press, though such favor ought very frequently not to be shown them. On the other hand, many a hard-working artist finds it difficult to get on, simply because he did not begin by being included among the favored ones. The principal cause of this consists in the want of independent judgment, and in the thoroughly American notion that any one who demands, and, what is more, obtains a large sum for his professional services must also be a man of eminent merit. As long as the success of an artist in this country depends upon external circumstances, art itself has a sorry chance, for such a state of things will simply result in the young artist's giving himself very little trouble, and gradually taking the appearance for the substance. 'An elegant toilet, a little voice, a goodly amount of boldness, and two or three kind friends on the press—these are the ingredients in a singer's success'—once said to us a lady, who understands the art of observation. On the whole, she is right, but that such should be the case is the fault of the critics, who partly for the above reasons, partly from others of a more reprehensible nature, but chiefly from the fact, rendered imperative by the mode of life in America, that in journalism a man cannot take time to go at all deeply into criticism, fail to appreciate their task, and do not dare to oppose a dam to the torrent of established usages.

"Here in America much is thought, for instance, of the daily papers containing a notice of an artist the very morning after the evening of his appearance. We, on the contrary, think that this system very frequently helps to cause that humbug which we have here to lament in the domain of art. The genuinely American idea that the way must be prepared for everyone, no matter how, throws the door wide open for superficiality, and leads to all the frequently highly comical effusions in the daily criticisms. Nobody, not even the most accomplished artist, is able to pronounce an opinion at all valid on, for instance, a Symphony, after a single hearing, and yet the American papers perform this miracle several times in the course of a season. It is true that the notices are something astonishing. The same remark holds good of the artists. How often must a speedy judgment be revoked, or modified; nay, how often has it already had to be so! In the case of a really great artist it is only the subsequent influence exerted by what he does that is of importance. Quickness is not witchcraft; it is simply the trick of a juggler. The quickness with which most of the lords of criticism serve us in this country, and on which the managers of the papers insist, is nothing more, and performed in the domain of art must necessarily lead to the most lamentable results."

The italicized words we ourselves have italicized, and not without good reason.

[It would be just as well for the German press to look at home. The American—even the New York and Boston—press is not very much worse than the German. A. S. S.]

Music Abroad.

COBLENZ.—At the first Subscription Concert, under the direction of Herr Max Bruch, the works selected for performance were: C-minor Symphony, Beethoven; "Jubelouverture," Weber; and "Frühlingsbotschaft," Gade. Herr De Swert, also, played a Concerto by Molique, and some smaller pieces.

SCHWERIN.—Her Härtel's opera Die Carabiniers, has been produced, but without much success.

BRESLAU. At the third concert of the Orchester-Verein, the principal pieces were Schumann's D-minor Symphony; the "Larghetto" from Spohr's C-minor Symphony; and Mendelssohn's Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Mlle. Alice Topp played several smaller compositions by Liszt.—The Singacademie lately gave an interesting performance consisting of the Motet: "Selig sind die Todten," by Schulz: "Actus Tragicus," Gottes Zeit, by S. Bach, and the Requiem, by Mozart.—L'Africaine is in rehearsal, and announced for production about the middle of January.

COLOGNE.—Appended is the programme of the third Gewandhaus Concert: Symphony, No. 2, Norbert Burgmüller; Overture to the Tempest, Benedict; the Walpurgisnacht, Mendelssohn. Herr von Königslöw played a Concerto by Spohr; and Herr Julius Stockhausen, besides sustaining the part of the Druid in Mendelssohn's work, sang an air from La Gazza Ladra, and some songs by Schumann. Mlle. Hayne, a pupil of the Conservatory, gave an air from Haydn's Creation.

MUNSTER.—Mendelssohn's Elijah and Cherubini's Requiem are in rehearsal, and will shortly be produced.

FRANKFORT-ON-THAINE.—The Philharmonic Association have performed a Symphony in C major by Jadasohn. It was greatly admired.

DRESDEN.—L'Africaine has at length been produced here. It was enthusiastically received.—Herr von Künnerwitz, the Intendant General of the Theatre Royal, has died suddenly of an apoplectic stroke.

STUTTGART.—Prenel's comic opera Der Schneider von Ulm, is in preparation.

FLORENCE.—The monument which Italy intends raising to the memory of Cherubini is nearly completed and ready for erection in the church of Santa Croce, already so full of memorials to so many famous men, such as Michael Angelo, Machiavelli, Galileo, Alfieri, Dante, etc. The plaster model is now on view at the studio of Signor Fantacchiotti, one of the first Italian sculptors of the day. It represents a Muse and a Genius; the latter has a medallion with a portrait of the Composer. The municipality of Florence have also given Cherubini's name to the street running parallel to that named after Cavour.

GENOA.—L'Africaine was produced here last month with great success.

ROME.—Meyerbeer's last great work, L'Africaine, has found its way even to the city of the Pope. It has met with its customary success.

Concerts in Paris.

[Correspondence of the Phila. Evening Bulletin].

PARIS, Nov. 29th, 1866.—The last week was one of lively musical interest on account of several important novelties, of which the resurrection of the Athenæum was not the least. It was the work of the celebrated banquier, M. Bischoffsheim, who, at the same time, built a fine hall in the finest quarter of Paris, at his own expense, for the use of the Society. The object of the institution is to advance literary and musical taste, and he grants the hall gratuitously to those having permission of lecturing or performing there. The receipts of these entertainments are reserved for charitable purposes. A noble enterprise, that has the triple aim of giving food to the mind and means of sustenance to the poor, as well as allowing artists, men of letters and savans to make themselves known, without incurring the trouble and risk of a concert or lecture given independently. Entertainments are to be given every Monday, Wednesday and Friday evening.

M. Pasdeloup is entrusted with the management of the musical department, and in order to fulfil his duties to satisfaction, has collected a fine orchestra and a chorus, perhaps the best in Paris, being composed mostly of advanced pupils of the Conservatoire and soloists of churches.

On Wednesday, the 21st, the opening soirée took place in the presence of an elegant invited audience, among whom were many prominent persons in the musical, literary and financial world.

The first performance of intrinsic importance, however, was offered to the public on Monday, the 26th. It was Haydn's "Seasons."

Mme. Vandenhevel, a daughter of Duprez, who sang the part of "Jeanne," is an artist of high rank. The mellowness and flexibility of her voice, a remarkable justness of intonation, added to a thorough schooling, enchanted the audience, who rapturously applauded her at every morceau. The chorus was admirable, particularly the soprani and tenors; the fugues were given by them with astonishing precision, and every part with justness and grace. M. Pasdeloup can be truly proud of them. The orchestra, also, was excellent.

The same indefatigable director gave us last Sunday, the 25th, an extraordinary treat, at his popular concerts. It was the E-minor concerto of Mendelssohn, and at the same time the first public appearance of Joachim in Paris.

The hall was densely crowded with an audience that came to judge rather than admire. But hardly had the first few tones escaped the violin, than the power of judging was lost in admiration.

The Allegro was played in a manner that defies description. It was the union of delicious fineness of tone, depth of feeling, and beauty of expression; the execution of enormous brilliancy, the intonation of an exactness only to be expected from keyed instruments. The spirit, as well as delicacy, of such perfection, that the audience was under a magical spell, as long as his bow touched the violin, and as with the last note dying away the charm was broken, there was an outburst of applause that continued and continued until it shook the very walls.

On Friday, the 23d, the great Mass in D of Beethoven was performed, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, for the first time in Paris.

For some time past, it has created considerable excitement in musical circles, and indeed its adversaries were more numerous than its friends. It was one of the last buildings of the great Cyclops, and it is well known how differently musicians view them; some thinking them the immense productions of a mind that had reached its culmination point, others the work of one whose terrible misfortunes had led the mind astray. There is no better argument against the latter opinion, than this Mass. It is grand, it is sublime; the work of a man who has found in the world nothing but troubles and disappointments, and forces that those troubles and disappointments are soon to be ended. We find at first resignation, then hope, and at last a heavenly sense of strength, which culminates in an ever-increasing triumph; the portals of heaven open, and his soul enters gloriously amid the choruses of Seraphim.

London.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The new season commenced on Friday, November 23rd, the programme consisting of Beethoven's First Mass and the Lobgesang of Mendelssohn. The mass was admirably performed, the quartets being sung by Mme. Sherrington, Miss Julia (or Mme. ?) Elton, Mr. C. Lyall, and Mr. Lewis Thomas.

Two more masterpieces were given at the second concert, viz., the Requiem of Mozart, and the Dettin-gen "Te Deum" of Handel.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—A Handelian work seldom heard in these days, Alexander's Feast, was performed at the 7th concert, with an efficient chorus, and Mme. Sherrington, Mr. Wilby Cooper and Mr. Lewis Thomas as soloists. The Musical World (Dec. 8) says:

In 1607 there appeared from the pen of Dryden a poem entitled "Alexander's Feast; or the Power of Music," an ode in honor of St. Cecilia's Day. The vanity of its author prompted him to declare it "the best ode that ever will be written," and the splendor of the composition has made it a classic. That it would not long remain unmarried to music was a thing of course, and in 1835-6 it was arranged for a musical setting by Newburg Hamilton, and delivered to Handel, then in the zenith of his powers. The music was completed to the end of the first part, January 5th, 1736. Seven days after the whole was finished, and on the 19th of February following it was first performed at Covent Garden. Handel was fighting a desperate and losing battle with the too powerful faction arrayed against him at the Haymarket. To carry on the war his fertile brain poured forth novelty after novelty, only to find that nothing could avert the coming ruin. One of those novelties was the music to Dryden's Ode, and this accounts for the speed with which it was brought before the public. We learn from a journal that "there never was, upon the like occasion, so numerous and splendid an audience at any theatre in London, there being at least thirteen hundred persons present; and it is judged that the receipts of the house could not amount to less than four hundred and fifty pounds. It met with very general applause." Two years afterwards, Walsh published the work by subscription, whereby Handel profited to the extent of nearly two hundred guineas. During the Lent concerts of 1737, "Alexander's Feast" was twice performed, and it was then put aside. In 1739 it was given once in March, "for the benefit of the musicians," and twice in November conjointly with "St. Cecilia's Day." The next time we hear of it is in Dublin, when the "Messiah" was first produced. On that occasion it was given twice, "with additions and several concertos on the organ." From this event (1741) to the composer's death (1759) the work was performed eight times. But we can hardly afford to sneer at the want of taste of our forefathers. How many times has "Alexander's Feast" been presented during the past nineteen years? As usual with Handel, but through no fault of his, it is scored for a thin orchestra. The overture is for strings (three violins in first movement) and two hautboys, throughout in unison with the first fiddle. In the chorus "Happy pair," the same instruments, with independent part for hautboys. Further on one bassoon is added; further, in the chorus "Bacchus ever fair and young," are two horns; and save that another bassoon is added (when the horns are taken away), this is the fullest development of the Handelian orchestra. Additions were, however, made by Mozart in 1790. These were made use of at the Crystal Palace. Of the music it is possible to speak in high praise. Some of the choruses are among the fine examples of their composer's power—ex gra: "Behold Darius," "The many rend the skies," and "Let old Timotheus." Among the solos must stand "Revenge, Timotheus cries," and the recitative "Give the vengeance due." No descriptive music brings more vividly before the mind's eye the scene it illustrates.

The novelty of the 8th concert was Mr. Arthur Sullivan's concerto for violoncello, composed for and played by Signor Piatti, and received with great and deserved favor. Its middle movement (andantino) is one of extreme beauty, and Signor Piatti played the whole to perfection.

The notable features of the 9th concert were Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Herr Wilhelm's violin playing, and Schubert's "Overture in the Italian style," No. 2, in C major, of which the book of words contained the following information:

"Herr Doppler, a friend of Schubert's, still alive, tells the story of this composition as follows; and it is a good illustration of Schubert's readiness to do anything of whatsoever kind, joke or earnest, in music, in which (amongst other things) he resembled Mozart, who was as ready for a Musikalischer Spass, or a set of droll catches, as for a symphony or sonata. At this time, says Herr Doppler, Rossini's operas were played in Vienna, to the exclusion of everything else. Schubert was constantly at the theatre, and while he was sharp enough on Rossini's weaknesses, no one was more delighted with his charming melodies. Coming back one night with some friends from Tancredi, however, their praise became a little too strong, and provoked him to say that as to the overture, he would undertake to compose any quantity of such as fast as he could write. His companions took him at his word, and a bet of a bottle of wine was made on the spot. Schubert set to work at once, and soon produced the first overture, which was followed shortly by that played to-day."

At the 10th concert the Symphony was Spohr's "Consecration of Tones"; and Mr. Dannreuther was the pianist and played Chopin's Krakowiak, which one of the critics (he of the Times, we believe) is pleased to call "nigger" rather than Polish music!

Concert Review.

The past week has offered comparatively little in the way of public musical performance; but the week preceding was rich in concerts. We will take them in the order of time.

Dec. 21. THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Musical Association. Another pleasant Friday afternoon, and another large and much delighted audience. Mozart held the chief place in the programme, as Beethoven and Schumann had done in the two preceding; thus:

Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Piano-forte Concerto, in F-sharp minor,
Norbert Burgmüller.
Allegro.—Larghetto.—Finale.
Ernst Perabo.

Symphony, in E flat.....Mozart.
Piano-forte Solo: "Études Symphoniques," (in the form of variations,) Op. 13.....Schumann.
Ernst Perabo.

Overture: "The Fair Melusina,".....Mendelssohn.

The Mozart music was delicious. It was with a real zest that we returned to him. It might cloy to hear him always; but we come back to a Symphony or an Overture of his as if to be reminded what pure music is. For Mozart seems to have been all music, nothing more and nothing less. His inspirations are as sure, complete and perfect as they are spontaneous. The most learned of musicians (after Bach), he is at the same time the most spontaneous. Earnest master, seeing his whole thought in all its bearings, holding all the parts and details of the work in due organic relation to the whole, filled with the truth of Art and loyal with the whole strength of conviction and of passion to the eternal laws of form, he yet seems as free and simple as a child, and brings you a Symphony as a child brings you a rose. It is that something divine called genius in a purer form, perhaps, and more continuous manifestation than any other art has known; genius realized in every act of life, whereas in most men it is but an aspiration only realized in happy moments, by great efforts, or in foregleams of some splendor scarcely yet arrived. In Mozart's music, the heaven, the complete harmony is here and now. You listen and the chains fall off, you soar into a freer element, more warm, more real too, than this every day world; you are transported to feel perfectly at home. If he does not thrill you always with great thoughts, he makes you sharer with him of an ideal, fine existence. There is no need to ask what Mozart means; there can be but one answer: he means music.

The familiar E-flat Symphony requires no description here. It is one of his four most perfect ones, almost as perfect as that in G minor. Simple and natural as all its themes sound, they have a delicate, ideal charm, a subtle life about them which pervades the whole development of form and harmony and color, making the whole work as fresh and exquisite and full of young delight as a June day. It is only in the development, the working up, that you realize what beauty and significance there is in the first Allegro theme as it glides in so quietly and slyly after the majestic introduction. The Minuet and Trio shine as a gem of purest ray. But in the Andante there is now and then a strong, stern passage which bids us pause, and shows that this Apollo of immortal youth, so full of joy, had stood in presence of great solemn facts. We never enjoyed a Mozart Symphony so well here in the rendering. It went evenly and smoothly, even in the wind instruments—and what delicious bits they have, how beautifully they are blended and contrasted in the conversation! The bassoons, to which he is always partial, seem inspired sometimes. We think many of the audience, after that experience, felt much in the humor for a revival of a series of Mozart Symphonies.

And the Zauberflöte Overture, with its starting challenge to the wondering imagination, before it proceeds to hold up a little fugue theme in the shifting play of a romantic, fairy light (see Oulibicheff's description in our last)—was it not almost as truly the overture to such a concert as to the opera for which it was written? Led by its magic wand we seemed to pass the portals of the actual world, to find ourselves in an ideal sphere where interests wholly musical and spiritual reign. This too was played with more precision and clearness than we have been accustomed to, though there is room always for improvement, for more refinement, in the rendering of so intricate and delicate a work.

The "Melusina" Overture (so well described by Schumann; see last number) came fitly into a programme, being thoroughly romantic and ideal, and yet as different as possible from Mozart in its whole individuality and style of treatment. It is a more subjective sort of romance, for one thing, or it would hardly belong to this our age. It was exceedingly enjoyed by those who listened with the outer and the inner ear; but some did not enjoy; partly because it came last in the concert, when the mind begins to be fatigued; but more because of the unreasonable and unseasonable insisting (by some) on an encore of the solo artist; which interruption of a carefully planned programme can only be regarded as another triumph of the party of disorder over the management of these concerts and a thoughtless interference with their original design and spirit. Certainly the hint printed on the programme that "these concerts by their length and character admit of no encores" was a reasonable one. Those who are anxious to hear the whole programme and not lose the fine overture which comes last, do not like to have their chance of that made doubtful and the envious hour slip from them by the intrusion of new matter, which after all is not so much more music as it is mere ceremony and personal compliment. Luckily, this time the concert proved shorter than had been calculated; but the objection on the score of length has hold good in every other instance. Then on the score of character, an artistically planned, symmetrical, complete programme is marred, distorted and defeated by encores. In a choice collection of paintings, each must hang in a good light; if now all the light be suddenly turned upon one, what becomes of its next neighbor? Overshadowed and lost, of course. Just so the "Melusina" overture this time, and the "Genoveva" last time were overshadowed and put half out of thought, if not of hearing, by the exaggeration of the preceding feature of the programme. (And who would not say, if there is room for encores, let us have a fine orchestral piece, a "Melusina" overture, repeated? That would be worth the while). Thus abstinence from encores was requested (it did not need to be requested with the original audience who guaranteed the concerts and gave them their tone) on grounds purely impersonal and general. These were meant to be "Symphony," or at least Orchestral concerts. They were privately organized, and the nucleus of the audience was made up privately, to ensure sympathy with programmes and arrangements purely artistic in their aim. If a Concerto or solo was introduced, it was for the sake of having this or that fine composition heard, rather than for the sake of introducing or exhibiting the player. Everything personal was to be kept out as far as possible; and if Mr. Dresel volunteered to play a Concerto by Schumann, or Mr. Leonhard one by Beethoven, or Mr. Parker one by Mendelssohn, or Mr. Lang something by Schubert, they did it in the spirit of devotion, to help on the good cause of the concerts and to give us a chance of hearing just these compositions. It was a labor of love on their part, a free will offering; and such offerings should be sacred from all those demonstrations, usual in more miscellaneous concerts, which would seem to force the bringers into an appearance of rivalry and virtuoso-like self-exhibition. Had the too eager admirers of the excellent young artists who came last, creating each a fresh sensation, only considered this, we are sure their own instinct of propriety would have taught them to respect a reasonable rule and at the same time a right of those who from the first have been responsible for the success and high tone of these concerts.

We have preferred to discuss this question purely upon general grounds and without any personal application. Hoping the long digression will be pardoned, we turn to the more pleasant task of speaking of the solo contribution upon that occasion. Mr. ERNST PERABO is already—even from the time when he first played in Boston in the Hummel Septet—sure to hold and to delight his audience, and whatsoever audience. Besides the consummate, easy skill, there is a certain magnetism in his playing that rivets attention and secures the sympathy already forestalled by the ingenuous, modest manner and the charm of youth. You see that he is full of the music, and that his conception of it is at least very earnest and sincere, sometimes original, and generally right; unerring judgment comes but with experience. We are not sure that he has not genius, but we think it best always to leave that question open. The Concerto which Perabo played, was by a composer to whom he is plainly partial, not one of the great composers, although he perhaps might have been had he lived longer. Norbert Burgmüller was born in Düsseldorf in 1810 and died at the age of 26, having written Symphonies, Overtures, Quartets, &c., all of which were thought to contain the spark of genius. This Concerto is an even, flowing, graceful, somewhat pastoral composition, quite spontaneous in its development and full of beauties of no mean order. The long orchestral introduction fascinates attention, and indeed the instrumentation throughout blends delicately and symphonically with the piano. It is plainly the work of a born musician; whereas the Henselt Concerto was the work of a pianist and the orchestral parts seem somewhat awkwardly tacked on. To the great majority, played as it was, it gave unqualified delight, and more exacting tastes had no cause to complain: he stock of great Concertos is pretty soon exhausted.

Mr. Perabo's second piece was one of the most interesting, as well as earlier, works of Schumann. Artistically and in wealth of invention a much more important work than the Toccata of which we lately spoke. As theme for these "Symphonic Studies" (and their large and noble manner justifies the title) Schumann took an earnest, deep-felt, pregnant melody invented "by an amateur," and, first stating it in full grand chords, proceeded to develop or transform it into a series of a dozen characteristic not mechanical or merely ornamental, Variations—having in mind no doubt such variations as Beethoven made to the number of 32 and 33 on given themes. (Mendelssohn and the young piano writer Saran have done likewise). With all these variations and contrasts of mood and rhythm, intermingling of new subjects, catching up of wayside inspirations, but impressing all fully into the strong career and spirit of the Theme, he goes on surprising and delighting the hearer. It is everywhere original, and clear to a degree not usual with Schumann's earlier works. The last variation is like a march, and grows into a long Finale, an independent movement almost, in the rondo form, although the original theme is never out of mind. It was a bold venture to play this long and learned piece without accompaniment in the great hall; but it succeeded to a charm—if only the charm had not been incontinently broken by that forced encore! The reward of the artist was in the hearts of his audience all the more surely without that.

Dec. 22. HERMANN DAUM's first "Beethoven Matinée" occurred at Chickering's on Saturday at noon. The selections were all from Beethoven.

Sonata, Piano and 'cello, Op. 5, No. 1, in F. Song, "Ich! Welch ein Augenblick!" from Fidelio. Sonata for Piano, Op. 31, No. 2, in D minor. Song, Trio for Piano, Violin & 'Cello, Op. 70, No. 2, in E flat.

The day was gloomy and the room unwarmed and cheerless. A thin audience sat shivering but patient to the end; and most felt well rewarded; who would not bear a little cold to hear so much good music! Mr. Daum was unluckily disappointed in his expect-tation of the aid of Messrs. SCHULTZE and WULF FRIES; but the two brothers SUCK were well up in this sort of music and the concerted pieces were fairly rendered, albeit rather tamely; the cold seemed to have struck through. And this cause also weakened Mr. Daum's conscientious rendering of the D-minor Sonata, the romantic one which is said to contain allusion to Shakespeare's "Tempest." Mr. RUDOLPHSEN sang Pizarro's song of rage and vengeance with a good deal of power, mastering a difficult task of vocalism; and the "Adelaide" was tastefully sung and accompanied (by Mr. Daum), although it was strange to hear the tenor love song in a bass voice.—We trust Mr. Daum will give his two remaining matinées under more genial auspices, for even criticism freezes in such cold, as well as the fingers and the nerves of a performing artist.

Dec. 23. HANDEL'S "MESSIAH." Annual Christmas performance, Sunday evening, by the Handel & Haydn Society. It rained in torrents, but the Music Hall was crammed to overflowing. With many it has become a sort of annual religious service, to attend a performance of this Oratorio at Christmas time. We should be glad sometimes to hear another Christmas Oratorio, Bach's for instance, even if Handel's be the greatest. Familiarity, to a certain point, makes a great work appreciated; but too long familiarity dulls the edge both of performing and of listening faculties; it becomes a matter of chance whether the happy moment of meeting the old acquaintance with fresh interest, as good as new, comes back at any given time. We have often been struck by the appetite and zeal and wide-awakeness with which the singers set about learning a fine new work, "St. Paul," for instance, and really made progress in rehearsing its intricate choruses, whereas in those of the old well-known work they seem to run in the grooves of the old habits, unconsciously repeating things which seem to do themselves precisely in the same old way. The Conductor needs a long lever—say a few years' oblivion—when he tries to lift them out into new light and better ways.

This night the choruses went on the whole as well as usual, some of them, the earlier ones especially, a little better. In point of musical sonority, balance of voices, &c., the effect of the H. & H. chorus is certainly improved of late. But there are tares still to be weeded out and timid, tardy motions strengthened in more than one of the fugued pieces; they might be clearer. It was a good average performance, greatly enjoyed of course, but oft-repeated hearing makes a very good performance necessary to any freshness of interest.

The solo airs and recitatives were mostly in new hands. The efforts were all creditable; but only in the case of Miss HOUSTON, who sang "I know that my Redeemer" with such truth of feeling as to make it fresh, was there anything like inspiration. Mrs. H. M. SMITH vocalized "Rejoice greatly" and other airs skilfully, with good voice, but coldly. There certainly is some real charm and pathos in Miss RAMETTI's rich contralto; and we must credit her with good conception and conscientious effort, full of promise; but she has hardly "grown up" yet (as the Germans say) to such a task as singing "He was despised." The younger Mr. WINCH (Wm. J.) has a beautiful, clear tenor voice, of good power, not yet developed, and sings with so good a method, in so chaste a style, and with so much intelligence that it was to us a greater pleasure to hear him, than we find in many more experienced and would-be impassioned tenors. The performance was somewhat cold and dry, but seemed to warrant high hopes. The new basso, also, Mr. J. F. WINCH, has a capital deep voice and sings as if more study and experience would make him a superior oratorio singer.

The full orchestra (of the Symphony Concerts) and the organ accompaniments by Mr. LANG, greatly strengthened and enriched the whole. We wondered at the omission of one single chorus, and that one in point of beauty and significance one of the best in the whole Oratorio: "And with his stripes."

Dec. 27. Mr. PERABO's second "Schubert Matinée" came at the very height of the furious gale that Thursday afternoon, when it was hardly safe to cross the streets. Yet the presence of a very pleasant, sympathetic little audience, including twenty or thirty ladies, proved the great interest felt in the young artist, and made the hour (for it was but an hour) quite cheery and inspiring. This was the programme:

Prelude and Fugue (in E Minor).....Mendelssohn.
Adagio and Allegro (for Horn and Piano)....Schumann.
Sonata in B major, Op. 147. (four movements).....Schubert.
Sonata in F. Op. 17. (For Horn and Piano).....Beethoven.
{ a. Prelude, No. 15, Op. 28.....Chopin.
{ b. Etude, No. 5, Op. 10.....Chopin.

Mr. Perabo played admirably throughout; the dainty Prelude of Chopin not with so fine a feeling as we have heard, but the brilliant Etude with splendid power and certainty. The Mendelssohn Prelude and Fugue is the one known to advanced pupils in this city, many of whom dash through the impassioned Prelude, and some of whom essay the Fugue. They were in the right hands this time. The Schubert Sonata was a much more interesting selection than that with which he began the series; thoroughly original, imaginative, Schubert-like; wayward and fitful enough in the perpetual strange modulation of the first movement, but strangely delicate in its pervading mood. The Andante (in E major chiefly) has a rich, religious sweetness, the figurative bass part in which seems almost to speak. The Scherzo and Trio and indeed the Finale sound quaintly naive and full of life. It was nicely touched throughout, with searching accent and good light and shade.

Mr. HAMANN produced very sweet, pure tones from his horn, which blended beautifully with the piano in both pieces. That by Schumann interested us much, but the Beethoven Sonata bore off the crown of the whole programme.

"SCHUMANN SOIREE" is the title under which Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA announces four concerts at Chickering's Hall. The first came on Thursday, too late for notice this week.

Hummel's Mass in E flat was performed on Christmas day by the choir of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, with full orchestra, under the direction of Mr. WILLCOX, who presided at the organ. The effect was very impressive, as was that of the Adeste fideles ("Portuguese Hymn") as arranged by V. Novello, and the "Date Sonitum" of Costa, sung as an Offertory by Mr. POWERS. Generali's Vespers, Rossini's Tantum Ergo, &c., formed part of the afternoon service.

NEXT IN ORDER. Next Tuesday evening, the second concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. Mr. LANG pianist. Beethoven Quintet in E-flat, op. 4; Sonata (piano and violin) in E-flat, by Dussek (first time); Schumann Quartet in A, op. 41; Mendelssohn's D-minor Trio.

Jan. 10. PERABO's third "Schubert Matinée."

Jan. 17. PETERSILEA's second "Schumann Soirée."

Jan. 18. FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. Mme. CAMILLA URSO will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and the "Ballade et Polonaise" by Vieuxtemps. Symphony: Schumann in D-minor, No. 4; Overtures: to "Les Abencerrages," Cherubini, and "Euryanthe," Weber.

The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing Handel's "Jephtha."

NEW YORK. Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN continues his Beethoven Matinées, with good audiences, in Steinway Hall, playing three of the Sonatas each time. In the fourth Matinée he presented Op. 14, No. 1, in E major; Op. 31, No. 1, in G; and Op. 90, in E minor,—a nice contrast. Herr Pollack, baritone, pupil of Stockhausen, sang.

The Maretzek Italian Opera have adjourned for a time for other cities, awaiting the completion of the Academy building. During the past month they have given, besides the usual round of pieces, Rossini's "Barber," with Ronconi for Figaro; Miss Kellogg, Rosina; Bellini, Dr. Bartolo; Antonucci, Basilio, (but, being hoarse, he had to resign the part to Sig. Fossati); Baragli, Almaviva. After, which, a greater novelty for these parts, Herold's Zampa. As we shall probably soon hear this opera done by the same artists in Boston, we quote from the Weekly Review:

Herold came of a musical family: his ancestors were professional musicians in Hamburg, and his father was a pupil of Bach and settled in Paris, where the composer of "Zampa" was born on the 28th of January, 1791. The latter took piano lessons of Adam and studied composition and theory of music from Catel and Méhul. After having obtained, in 1812, a first prize for a cantata, he was sent, at the expense of the State, to Rome and Naples, whence he returned to Paris, in 1815. He died in that city on the 18th of January, 1833. The opera was for a long time the favorite one in France and Germany, and is indeed a master-piece of romantic music. The melodies are original and flow so easily and smoothly that the composer seems to have been in a continuous state of inspiration during their composition. The orchestration and instrumentation are accurate and of a most delicate taste, while there is no lack of power or effect in the more passionate and dramatic parts of the work. Good justice was done to the opera, and the artists took great pains to make the performance highly enjoyable. Signor Mazzoleni was especially brilliant in the second act and was a capital Corsair. The part which he undertook is a trying one, and there might have been fears entertained that the artist would get hoarse after the exertions of the first act; but just the contrary took place, and Sig. Mazzoleni has won new laurels in his new role. Siga. Poch, as Camilla, sang with much taste and purity, while Signora Testa was a sprightly and very efficient Rita. The manner in which this lady produces her lower tones is not very artistic and proves rather a deficiency in her lower register, but she is, notwithstanding, a very useful and experienced artist. We cannot say the same of Signor Testa, whose voice is sadly on the wane and who has to force almost every note he sings. If his voice was half as good as his appearance, he would be undoubtedly very acceptable. Signor Bellini, as Daniel Capuzzi, was splendid in dress as well as in acting and singing, and played the part of the reckless bigot and the bigot coward as well as the henpecked husband with immense success. The mere mentioning of Signor Ronconi's playing the part of Dandolo will be sufficient to convince our readers of the excellence with which it was rendered. The orchestra under Carl Bergmann, and the chorus were also very satisfactory, and the dresses new and excellent.

The plot of Zampa is thus described in a Philadelphia paper, after its performance there by the now unhappily defunct French opera troupe:

The plot of "Zampa" is rather stupid—of the "Don Giovanni" order. Zampa is a bold pirate, who has betrayed a young girl named Alice, who dies of a broken heart. Her statue is worshipped by the peasants. The scene takes place in Italy, where a young lady, named Camille, lives. She is about to be married, when Zampa enters and tells her that her lover is dead, and that he holds her father in his power, having captured him; and adds, that if Camille does not wed him (Zampa) by a certain hour that her father will perish. Camille consents. She retires to assume her bridal robes, when Zampa notices the statue of Alice, which stands in one corner of the room. In a fit of bravado he places a ring on her marble finger, and swears to marry only her. He is then sent for by Camille, and remembering the ring hastens to remove it from the hand of the statue, but her arm rises suddenly and points threateningly at him. This tableau ends the first act.

The second and third may be condensed as follows: Camille is about to wed Zampa, when the lover supposed to be dead returns. There is a great denunciation scene, in which Zampa triumphs. He marries Camille and treats her badly, and, at the proper time, the statue of Alice, with the wedding ring on her finger, appears, and drags him down below in the midst of red fire.

All this suggests the statue business in "Don Giovanni." Zampa is a weak imitation of Mozart's cavalier, and the plot is not any too good, but the music is charming—reminding me very much of Auber. Indeed, Zampa's scene in the second act reminds me of "Fra Diavolo." The music of Camille is exceedingly pretty. Her romance in the first act, the duet in the second with Alphonso, and the grand duet in the third, with Zampa, afford fine chances for dramatic singing, which Mlle. Naddie certainly took advantage of. She is a graceful actress, a very pretty woman, and her method is first class. Her vocalization in florid music is in the highest French style. In the fine finale to the second act she was admirable. M. Armand, who sang with the German opera a couple of years ago, gave an excellent rendition of Zampa. He is a splendid actor and good vocalist. Perhaps he forces his voice a little too much, but in the ensembles he was very effective, and especially in his arduous scene at the commencement of the second act. Mlle. Laurentis is a sprightly little performer, and sings like a nightingale. The rest, including chorus and orchestra, were excellent.

The charming young debutante, Miss Hauck, renewed her triumphs in the Sonnambula. The last week brought another revival, Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera," in which figured three young ladies, all comparatively debutantes: Miss McCullough as Amelia, Miss Hauck as Oscar, and Mlle. Stella Bonheur as Ulrica. "The Barbier closed the unprofitable season at the Winter Garden, and Maritzek will 'try his luck' in Baltimore, Washington and Boston." The Academy will be opened about the 20th of February.

The programme of the second PHILHARMONIC CONCERT (Dec. 15) was as follows: Part I. Beethoven's 4th Symphony; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by Mme. Camilla Urso. Part II. Introduction to Lohengrin; Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor (first movement), by Mlle. Sophie Groschel (daughter of an esteemed music teacher in New York and a pupil of the Stuttgart Conservatory); Ballade et Polonaise, by Vieuxtemps (Mme. Urso); Overture: "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9, in A, Berlioz.

The "Messiah" was performed on Christmas evening by the HARMONIC SOCIETY, at Steinway's Hall. The solos were sustained by Miss Maria Brainerd, Miss C. V. Hutchings, Mr. Geo. Simpson and Mr. J. R. Thomas. It appears to have been an uncommonly fine performance. A member of our Handel and Haydn Society, who sang in the chorus, was astonished that a body of voices so much smaller in number than our own could produce so much effect. Much of the credit is due of course to the Conductor, Mr. F. L. Ritter. The organist, too, Mr. Samuel P. Warren, is excellent, and there was a good orchestra.

The 15th Sunday Concert (Dec. 9) at Steinway Hall, under the Bateman-Harrison management, offered for orchestral pieces: Spontini's Overture to "La Vestale;" Concert Overture in A, by Rietz; Romanza and Scherzo from Schumann's D-minor Symphony; Allegretto from Beethoven's 7th Symphony; and part of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Mme. Fanny Raymond Ritter sang "Jerusalem" from St. Paul, and a Ballad: "Elfenliebe," composed by F. L. Ritter, and was recalled twice. A new violinist, Mr. Wenzel Kopta, played selections from Paganini and Vieuxtemps. In the 16th concert, Mme. Johansen sang an air from Freyshütz, and "Isolina" by Stigelli; Herr Chandon, basso, from the Royal Opera, Stuttgart, sang from the "Magic Flute;" and Herr Bökelman, pianist of the Bülow-Liszt school, played pieces by Chopin, Raff and Liszt.

The third Quartet Soirée, at Anschütz's Music Institute, took place on Tuesday night at Steck's warehouses. Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, and Schumann's Quartet in A, were performed, besides a variety of unimportant solo performances, the only one of which worth mentioning was the playing of Hummel's Piano Quintet, by Mr. Kalliwoda, a very respectable pianist, raised in the old piano school, but evidently a conscientious and painstaking artist.—Review, Dec. 29.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The second Philharmonic Concert (Dec. 8) offered Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and the "Tell" overture. Mr. Richard Hoffmann played Beethoven's piano Concerto in C minor, and, with Mr. Geo. Wm. Warren, a Marche di Braviura by the latter, called "The Andes," for two pianos. Miss Kellogg sang the Prayer and Scene from "The Star of the North," and a Barcarolle by Gounod. The Directors of the Philharmonic present a discouraging report; the expense of each concert is $2,500 this season against $900 last year; and with the small list of subscribers it will be impossible, they say, to carry out the prospectus without exhausting the reserve fund of $3000.

ROCHESTER, N. Y. Mr. James M. Tracy gave his first Pianoforte Recital (second series) Dec. 15th. He opened the concert with a Beethoven Sonata (op. 10, No. 1, in C minor), and closed it with the great one in C major, op. 53, and he played a Chopin Waltz (in A flat, op. 64). The rest of the programme, songs and piano pieces, was supplied by some half dozen of his pupils.—The second Recital (Dec. 29) was likewise opened and closed with Beethoven Sonatas: op. 2, No. 2, in A, and op. 22, in B flat.

Robert Schumann's Compositions.

1834. Schumann had just established his musical journal, Die Neue Zeitschrift, and naturally therefore his musical productivity could not be important. In fact he only wrote two piano compositions, of which the first to be named is the "Etudes Symphoniques," published as Op. 13. It is founded on a theme which owes its origin, according to Schumann's statement, to the father of Ernestina (a young lady to whom he was deeply attached); and so here again, as in his "Allegro Variations" and "Impromptus," Schumann shows himself as in a certain sense a composer of occasional pieces. The so-called "Etudes Symphoniques," 12 in number, are a side-piece to the Impromptus; like these, although wearing an almost opposite coloring, they belong in the category of Variations, and in an equal degree they show the power of a varied, rich imagination over a given theme. But they are decidedly superior to the Impromptus in their greater clearness and pregnancy of thought; which is not to be wondered at, since between these two works lie the unpublished Variations on the Schneckschütz Waltz and on the Allegretto from Beethoven's A-major Symphony; so that Schumann had had considerable practice in the Variation form.

The last piece of the "Symphonic Studies," although partly built upon the theme, is properly no Variation, but an independent, more extended musical movement belonging to the Rondo form.

In the year 1852 Schumann prepared a new edition of this work. It differs from the original edition, apart from some unessential alterations, in the title, which now reads more definitely: "Etudes en forme de Variations;" also by an improvement in the form of the last piece, fitly called Finale, as well as by the omission of two variations, namely the third and the ninth.

The second composition, undertaken in 1834, but only finished in the following year, was the "Carneval," under the title: "Scènes mignonnes sur 4 Notes pour Piano, op. 9;" and in no other work of Schumann perhaps are such direct allusions to actual life perceptible as in this. Schumann himself says of it: "It originated in a serious mood and in peculiar circumstances." It really was so; and the involuntary beginning of the habit of expressing all that had powerfully moved the musician's soul through the medium of musical language, in a cycle of single pieces closely connected together by an inward tie, gained ground in this way. After its production, the whole was brought into connection with the idea of a masquerade—hence the title of "Carneval"—in which each individual experience, personified, should appear in motley procession. This is the explanation of the music pieces bearing the superscriptions: Florestan, Eusebius, Chopin, Chiarina (Clara), Estrella (Ernestine), Paganini, Papillons (allusion to Op. 2),—between which slip in and out the typical masquerade figures of Pierrot and Harlequin, of Pantaloon and Columbine—and finally also the march of the "Davidsbündler" (David-confederates) against the "Philister." . . .

In a letter to Moscheles (Sept. 22, 1837) Schumann writes: "The Carneval is for the most part occasional in its origin and, save three or four movements, is built all the time upon the notes A, S (E-flat), C, H (B natural), which form the name of a Bohemian village, where I had a musical lady friend, but which, strangely also are the only musical letters in my own name (Schumann). The superscriptions I added later. Is music then not always sufficient and expressive in itself? Estrella is such a name as one puts under a portrait, to hold the image fast; Reconnaissance, a scene of recognition; Aveu, a love confession; Promenade, an allusion to our German ball-room custom of walking arm in arm with one's lady. The whole has absolutely no artistic worth; singly, the various moods of mind embodied are of interest to me."

From this it appears that Schumann very severely condemns the "Carneval" three years after it was written. In denying to his creation all artistic worth, he certainly goes beyond the truth. The "Carneval" is by no means without artistic worth, at least in comparison with his preceding works. To be sure, the forms of the single pieces are mostly small and, with a few exceptions, not much carried out; but nevertheless they bear the stamp of a compact organic structure; and, with slight exceptions, as for example in the "Preamble" (which was made last) with its relation to the closing piece, they show also perfect clearness of thought. Every thing about them, without exception, is characteristic and new; the ground thought, the melodic, harmonic and rhythmical forms, and their variety, when we consider that the fundamental motive of most of the pieces is based always on the same four notes, betrays a rich elastic power of invention. In a word, we have here a thoroughly genuine piece of Schumann music in the most pleasant sense, with innumerable clever traits, hardly to be indicated by words, such as few other works of his afford. Much of it is simply charming, elegant, graceful and tasteful; but the Finale is thoroughly humorous and comical in its development, particularly through the very effective introduction of the "Philister" with the Grandfather's Dance, which last appears in highly edifying contrast to the firmly marked rhythm of the Davidsbündler march striding in with solemn gravity in 3-4 time, and in the battle with which the David-Confederates of course come off victorious. This last piece might be called tendentis,* but without implying any reproach, inasmuch as it has enough that is attractive simply as a piece of music.

* There is, we believe, no English equivalent for this adjective. The Germans apply it to a work of Art which has any reference to something outside of Art itself.—Tr.

The compositions of the year 1835 consist of the two Sonatas, already begun in 1833, in F-sharp minor, op. 11, and in G minor, op. 22. The first appeared under the strange title: "Piano-forte Sonata, inscribed to Clara, by Florestan and Eusebius." It is a genuine Davidsbündler composition, full of rich but most abruptly, suddenly contrasted moods, making the proclaimed authorship of the two mightiest Bündler (confederates) all the more explainable and fit.

Schumann once spoke of his compositions during the years 1830-35 as "dreary stuff;" in no other case could he say that with more truth than of this Sonata. No one will deny the worth of many single moments in it, and especially the bold and powerful headway which Schumann has here made; but quite as little can one overlook the fact that the single portions are out of unity with the whole, that there is an utter lack of organic development, of logical spinning out of thought, and that a turgid and at times inelegant expression is predominant throughout. There can be no question that the fault is chiefly owing to the want of mastery of form. Above all, the complex Sonata form, till then entirely untouched by Schumann, must at the outset have placed unconquerable difficulties in his way; and it was not at all accidental or without intrinsic reason that the two Sonatas, already begun in 1833, were not taken up again and finished until 1835. The F-sharp minor Sonata everywhere betrays a painfully laborious wrestling with form, leading to no satisfactory result. If no positive artistic value can be ascribed to it, yet it is important as a transitional work in view of what followed afterwards. In the history of Schumann's artistic development it forms as it were a mountain barrier, whose narrow passes had to be violently broken through to prepare a smooth bed for the stream of thoughts. (The later edition of this Sonata is only distinguished from the first by the correction of some errors, and by the title, which now, in the place of "Florestan and Eusebius," names Schumann as the author).

The progress he had made is clearly enough announced in the G-minor Sonata; for this has the decided advantage over its sister of greater definiteness and clearness of form, although some single portions, for example the middle part of the Andante, have not yet attained to full working out of the thought. The most valuable piece in it, to be sure, the last movement, was only composed at the end of 1838, that is to say three years later than the rest, during Schumann's temporary stay in Vienna, in place of the original Finale; and, on a close comparison with the other three parts of the Sonata, it shows a far more masterly handling of form. The articulation and moulding of the thoughts and structure of periods, the shaping of the whole, the well defined expression—all are present here in such a degree that the intentions of the composer stand out sharply and clearly. Moreover the fundamental character of the last piece is in keeping with the deeply melancholy expression of the preceding movements, which seem satiated with the glow of a suppressed passion; so that the work in its totality presents a speaking image of the deeply excited states of mind, by which Schumann was filled and swayed during the period between 1836 and 1840.

[During the next year (1836) occurred the death of Schumann's mother, the mutually friendly close of his intimate relations with Ernestine, and the awakening of his passionate love for Clara Wieck, which was reciprocated, but balked by the opposition of the father. This "critical condition" lasted into 1837].

Meanwhile he gave vent to his oppressed heart through two extended and in many respects very significant compositions. One of these was the already mentioned "Concerto for Piano-forte alone;" the other the Fantasia in C major, op. 17, for Piano. According to Schumann's list of his compositions the last named work was the first in origin, and was prompted by a special occasion, namely by the appeal which went out from Bonn, on the 17th December, 1835, through all Germany in behalf of the Beethoven statue which was there erected in August, 1845. It was Schumann's purpose, in composing this piece, to contribute the proceeds of its sale to the fund for the monument to the great master, and on that account to name it "Obolus." In like manner the single movements were to bear respectively the superscriptions "Ruins," "Triumphal arches," and "Wreath of Stars;" the symbolical interpretation is left to every one's conjecture. But afterwards, for reasons not known, Schumann gave up the idea of publishing the Fantasia for that object, and dropped the titles at the same time. Instead of these he affixed to the work as a motto the strophe by Fr. Schlegel:

"Durch alle Töne töst
Im bunten Erdentraum
Ein leiser Ton gezogen
Für den der heimlich lauschet."

and on its appearance dedicated it to Franz Liszt.

No fitter title could have been found for this piece of music, than that which has been given it of "Fantasia." All the three movements separately considered—the order in which they succeed one another is different, to be sure, from the traditional one—have at first sight something approaching the Sonata form; but on nearer acquaintance you perceive as a characteristic of the Fantasia the free intermingling of different Art forms. Thus the first section of the first movement, essentially developed out of the main thought, which runs as far as the 19th measure, bears unmistakably the character of the Sonata form; then follows a middle section in the song form, only once interrupted by the passing entrance of the main thought; and at the close comes back the first section with some modifications.

The second movement, march-like in its main thought, belongs in great part to the Rondo form; but it is also interrupted after the first section by a two-part song-like interlude, which then, in its further development is underbuilt and mingled with a pointed figure taken from the principal motive, and finally leads back again to the first theme.

The third and last movement belongs throughout to the song form; there are two main passages, in C and A flat, which at last mingle peculiarly and run out into a Coda.

The whole work, weighed by its ideal contents, must unhesitatingly be counted among the most important that Schumann created during his first productive period extending to the year 1840. The motives, with all their originality, are uncommonly intensive, and in most cases have a significant melodic charm, rather in the sense of a Beethoven to be sure, than in that of a Haydn or a Mozart. There is something altogether Titanic and world-storming in them, which, roaring onward on the wings of a bright blazing fancy, would enchain the soul of the listener, if only the presentation of the whole, with all its depth and grandeur, were more complete and plastic. The chief clogs upon the hearer's sympathy in passages of this work are engendered by those peculiar complicated rhythmical forms, which do not achieve a clear outlet for themselves until somewhat later, and which here, as in the preceding works, sometimes overstep the measure of a beautiful movement. The last piece alone may form an exception to this remark, as this comes nearest to the demands of a measured exposition, although it is inferior to the first two in all that regards the grandeur and fine enthusiasm of the leading thoughts.

The Philosophy of the Fine Arts.

Next in the ascending series of the fine arts stands Sculpture. Originally, as we have seen, it was closely allied to Architecture, and for a long time subordinate to it. The statues of India and Egypt are all essentially architectural; with half closed, heavy eyes, and arms pinioned to their sides, they lack life and liberty. Greek statuary, on the other hand, is endowed with a freedom and individuality corresponding to the emancipation of the religious consciousness of the Greek people. This freedom, however, was only a gradual attainment on the part of the Greeks. "Life is short, and art is long," and the perfection of all human productions is not to be reached by the efforts of a few generations, much less within the hour-glass of one man's life, but depends on the accumulated labor and experience of successive ages, each mounting higher than the former by a slow, spiral ascent, which often seems like moving on a dead level. Thus the earlier Greek sculpture is only a slight advance beyond the Indian and the Egyptian, and appears to have been derived from them. It is a different stage of the same type, another expression of a religious symbolism, in which every attitude, limb, and feature has some moral or intellectual significance. Consequently we find in the remotest periods of Hellenic art images which we might expect to see only on the banks of the Nile or the Ganges. Three-eyed Jupiters, four-armed Apollos, a Bacchus in the form of a bull, a Eurynome like a mermaid, a colossal Diana with ten hieroglyphic tiers of breasts, and a black Ceres with the head of a horse encircled with serpents. The period which produced these monstrosities was pantheistic; they are the embodiments of the old Orphic theology, in which the gods were regarded as substantial potencies or powers of nature, prescriptive types of ideas and qualities to which we do not always possess the key. Apollo was originally the sun-god, extending his arms on all sides like rays of light. But as light is the emblem of knowledge, he became the god of prophecy and the corypheus of the Muses, and finally was endowed with a distinct personality as the god-man, the ideal of spiritual power and beauty. So it was with the oldest images of all the deities, which were supposed to have fallen from heaven. They were highly symbolical in their purpose, and very stiff and conventional in their mode of representation. In some of the most primitive temples they were mere blocks of wood or stone, with limbs and lineaments rudely indicated by lines drawn on or deeply cut into the surface, after the manner of Egyptian bassorilievos. In other the divinities are not distinguishable from each other in form or feature, but only by their emblems,—the thunder-bolt, the trident, the caduceus, or the palm-branch. They were not intended to resemble persons, but to represent principles. The lively imagination and symmetrical mind of the Greek soon revolted against the bungling and materialistic methods of expressing attributes. The hundred hands of Briareus and the multitudinous eyes of Argus are cheap and childish contrivances to indicate power and intelligence, compared with the ambrosial curls and knitted brow of the Olympian Jove or the prophetic glance and majestic front of Apollo. Yet so slow was the growth of art even in Greece, that after Dædalus had half freed the statue from its original clay by opening its eyes and separating its legs, eight centuries elapsed before it became a living soul under the hand of Phidias.

Sculpture, as well as architecture, was at first employed exclusively in the service of religion, and even during its palmiest days, in the age of Pericles, it continued to be devoted to this end in all its highest efforts. In Athens there was doubtless much stone cutting and wall-painting applied to the daily necessities of life, but statues and pictures, as objects of art, were, as we have said, unknown in private dwellings. Before the time of Socrates there is not a single instance of a portrait bust; and portrait-painting was first practised in the school of Apelles, a contemporary of Alexander the Great. Pausanias (I. 46) informs us that a certain Phryne contrived to gain possession of a statuette of Cupid made by her lover Praxiteles; but she dared not incur the danger of keeping it, and consequently atoned for her impiety by consecrating it as a public work of art at Thespia, her native city. In Athens there were no private galleries of art, such as we find in modern European cities. Phidias was forbidden even to put his name on the statue of Minerva; and because it was alleged that in the representation of the battle of the Greeks and Amazons, which adorned the shield of the goddess, he had introduced among other figures the portraits of himself and his friend Pericles, he was accused of impious ambition and thrown into prison, where he died. It was not until the Macedonian age that the plastic arts began to forget their sacred destination, and degenerate into means of gratifying the luxury of individuals. The function of the sculptor was half priestly; he was the commissioned interpreter of the gods. We are told that, when Phidias had completed the Olympian Jove, the lightning fell from heaven and touched the statue in approbation of the work. It is this sense of sacredness that confers a value on these forms. In the progress of sculpture, from the brute shape of an Ephesian Diana to the beautiful proportions of an Apollo Belvedere, we can trace the progress of theological ideas from pantheism to anthropomorphism.

The same is true of Christian sculpture and painting. In the Middle Ages, as in Asia, in Egypt, and in Greece, art began with religious themes. Architecture, as we have seen, led the way, and became the parent of the whole family of arts. It is difficult for us to form a conception of the sacredness which surrounded the vocation of the mediæval artist. He had a higher aim than technical beauty, the glories of color, or feats of anatomical skill. It was a holy office committed to consecrated hands. The academies of art in those days were religious fraternities and societies for spiritual edification. Such were the schools of Siena and Florence during the fourteenth century. The code which prescribed the qualifications for membership laid more stress on personal piety than on technical skill. A Spanish sculptor who broke in pieces a statue of Christ because the purchaser refused to pay a stipulated price, was convicted of sacrilege by the Inquisition. As an artist he was ordained to a holy task. The marble became in his hands what the wafer is in the hands of the priest, a sacred thing; and as it was moulded into form, it received a consecration which took it from the possession of the individual and placed it under the protection of the Church.

To this habit of thinking, more than to any influence of climate and social customs, the Greeks owed their supremacy in sculpture, and the mediæval Italians their superiority in painting. On this ladder art ascended to the heaven of its divineness. Its objects were not deified by their beauty, so much as beautified by their divinity. The artist was at the same time a worshipper, to whom the expression of beauty was a service of piety, and from the depths of whose fervent religious emotion sprang forth a throng of shapes flashing with all the lustre that devotion could lavish upon them. The rude, unfashioned stone, before which the Arcadian bowed in reverence, was like a magnet that set in motion all the invisible currents of his religious nature. It was this fine susceptibility to mental impressions derived from material images, aided by an exquisite perception of the significance and æsthetic value of form, that enabled Grecian art to break the tough chrysalis of a conventional type, and emerge free and gloriously transmuted.

In sculpture still more than in architecture the thought predominates over the material, and is more clearly expressed in it. It is therefore a higher art than architecture. The material is the same, but it takes a bodily form, and thus advances from the inorganic. It is not merely erecting a temple, but it is building a human body, the temple of the soul. The perfection of sculpture rests on the correspondency of soul and body, on the idea of the supremacy of the psychological over the physiological, that every soul builds its own body and finds in it an adequate expression of itself; as Spenser says,

"For of the soul the body form doth take,
For soul is form, and doth the body make."

In painting the spiritual predominates still more over the material; in fact, one of the primary qualities of matter is eliminated, viz. thickness. A painting has only two dimensions, length and breadth. Sculpture uses the same substance as architecture, but it controls and permeates it more completely; there is no superfluous residue, nothing that is not filled with life. In the glow of the artist's inspiration, the marble becomes as wax in his hands, and is easily moulded to the image of his thought. Painting, in its purer ideality, works in a finer substance. It represents the life of the soul, not in the heavy masses of sculpture, but in the play of light and shadow on a colored surface. The simple fact that painting can represent that "world of eloquent light," the human eye, gives it a vast superiority over the somnambulant form of sculpture; although it must be confessed that this limitation of sculpture is not without peculiar advantages, for the light which is withdrawn from the eye is diffused through all the members, spiritualizing them, so that the statue seems only to have been "laid asleep

In body, and become a living soul."

Sculpture is best employed in isolated figures, and seldom ventures beyond the representation of small groups in which the characters are intimately related; such as man and woman both together constituting one complete human being; the youth, the maiden, and the mother; Laocöon and his sons in the folds of the serpent; Sleep and Death, as seen at San Ildefonso in Spain; or the celebrated trinity of Scopas and Praxiteles, personifying the kindred affections, Eros, Himeros, and Pothos. It is only in basso-relievo that it can express the complex interests of heroic or dramatic sentiment consistently with grace and dignity; and all the larger groups of free sculpture which antiquity has bequeathed to us, such as the Niobe, the Elgin and the Ægean marbles, were purely architectonic, i. e. they were employed as reliefs to adorn the metopes and pediments of temples, and were therefore in their nature and use pictorial. Painting, on the contrary, does not stop with the single portrait or the group, but, by means of foreshortening and perspective, blends the far and the near into great compositions, epic, historical, and allegorical. The oldest sculpture is architectural, and the oldest painting is sculptural. Each grew up in apprenticeship to its predecessor before it appeared as a master-art. Sculpture, in the different phases of rilievo, was first employed as a decoration in connection with temples, and color was originally applied to enliven and heighten the expression of statuary. Thus they are all united in a vital continuity of development; emanations of the same pious enthusiasm, and devoted to the same spiritual service.

Few will doubt that the Reformation gave us a sounder morality, a more beautiful charity, and a purer doctrine; but, at the same time, it was attended with a great decrease of that superabundant religious sensibility which overflows in all manner of idolatries. What the moral being gained, the imagination lost. An abstract and metaphysical creed seldom leads the worshipper to the cultivation of any supererogatory and luxurious devotion. It abjures the images of the Saviour, the Virgin, and the saints, and watches over the dry spirituality of its worship with iconoclastic jealousy. Even the consecrated walls have been stripped of their sacredness, and the word Church transferred from the edifice to the invisible body of the devout assembly. But, above all, the Reformation unsealed the Bible and put it into every man's hand, and by this simple act thrust aside the statues and the pictures which had hitherto been the chief authorized and accessible interpreters of religion. Christianity, however, even from an æsthetic point of view, does not find its fullest and highest expression in the sublime conceptions of Michel Angelo, or in the forms of beauty which grew up under the touches of Raphael's pencil, but seeks a more spiritual medium of utterance in music, poetry, and prose; in these, especially in the last two, Protestantism records the most splendid achievements. It shines pre-eminently in its literature.

Of the five senses with which man is endowed, only two are inlets of beauty to the soul, namely, the eye and the ear. The ear is a more spiritual organ than the eye, furnishes a readier access to the soul, and contributes more to mental culture and the growth of the finer feelings. Through the eye, the soul pours itself out on the external world; through the ear, it draws into itself by mysterious cords the spiritual content of the external world. The eye is periphery; the ear, central. By means of the former, we see the outer man, what he does; by means of the latter, we get the most perfect conception of the inner man, his thought embodied in speech. Sight conveys a knowledge of form and of the mutual relations of things in space; sound gives us an idea of their internal structure. We know that a body is hard, dense, brittle, or elastic, not from its shape, nor even from its resistance to pressure, but from the tone which it emits when in vibration. By this we are made acquainted with the ultimate constitution and arrangement of particles underlying all tangible and visible qualities.* We conclude, then, that the speaking arts, which address themselves to the ear, are higher and more spiritual than the imaging arts which are addressed to the eye. The first of these speaking arts is Music. Painting, as we have seen, is a mere surface having only two dimensions. Music is still freer from physical conditions; it leaves out all relations of space, and stands midway between a thought and a thing; its material is sound, which does not occupy space, but develops itself in time. The vibrations which produce the tone are indeed propagated in space, but they are not the tone; they are its scientific explanation as a phenomenon, but are never associated with its effects. Music is the natural expression of feelings, as speech is the natural expression of thoughts; acting immediately on the emotions, it bears only an indirect relation to ideas, which it never calls up except by association. Music, the language of feeling, cannot be adequately translated into speech, the language of thought. It enlivens and directs the imagination and fills the soul with delightful reveries, but it lacks precision; it is ineffable, it cannot be told in words. In this apparent defect lies the real and peculiar power of music. Sentiment is at once more and less than thought; more, because in the emotions lie the germs of many thoughts; less, because these germs are only possible thoughts; there is more substance in the feelings, more clearness in the thoughts. Men are less separated in the former than in the latter. The whole world fraternizes in music; it is a universal language; it is the inarticulate voice of the heart, recognized by and appealing to all.

Every art has certain limitations beyond which it cannot pass with impunity, and the attempt on the part of music to express ideas, or to represent things, has always turned out disastrous. In striving after the mere illusion of the ear, it is degraded from its high function. Its greatest achievements are not to whistle like a bird, to ring like a bell, or to bang like a culverin. The climax of absurdity in this respect was attained in the musical buffoneries of the German and Italian contrapuntists of the seventeenth century, who employed all the resources of violin and oboe in giving the cackle of a hen, or in rendering in legato the "linked sweetness long drawn out" of mewing cats, with an occasional staccato thrown in by way of a spit. Thus the sheep of Marcello bleat in soprano, and the oxen low in contralto, all of which may have been very ideal and edifying to the Venetians, who might never have an opportunity of hearing those animals. There is a sublimity in a natural storm which even the best performer of Steibelt's musical one fails to represent by tipping the upper notes in imitation of rain-drops and rumbling among the lower keys with both hands full of thunder. In this gross mimicry of sounds, music, the purest of the arts, is degraded to a juggler's trick. It may excite gaping astonishment and gratify low curiosity; so does the man on the market-place who swallows tow and pulls ribbons out of his mouth. Paganini was a genius, but when he strove after vulgar effect by fiddling on one string, he was no better than a clown cutting antics on a tight rope; and Eulenstein playing a tune on sixteen Jews harps stands no higher as an artist than the Italian harlequin who keeps six oranges in the air. In favor of imitative music some may be disposed to cite examples from the great masters,—the magnificent Hailstorm-Chorus of Handel, or the plaintive cuckoo-notes of the clarinet in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. But here the end sought is not a barren imitation; the rage of the elements and the song of the bird are lost sight of in the grander themes which

* It may be true that men are less moved by what they hear than by what they see

"Sæpius irritant animos demissa per aures
Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus, et quæ
Ipse sibi tradit spectator."

The eye, it is true, takes in and interprets more quickly, but the impressions are less deep and lasting than those received through the ear.

they suggest and blend with the whole composition in harmonious subordination to a spiritual purpose. So little indeed is music a mere reproduction of the sounds that enter through the sensual ear, that the peculiar grandeur of Beethoven's compositions is attributable in a great measure to the deafness which afflicted him during the latter half of his life. What celestial melodies entranced his soul in the midst of the silence of earth!

If we compare music with painting, we shall see a striking resemblance in the materials of the two arts,—in the seven tones of the diatonic scale and the seven colors of the solar spectrum. Dark and light colors produce effects corresponding to those produced by deep and high tones; such epithets as gentle, subdued, loud, &c., apply equally to both. There is also a moral quality in colors as well as in tones; gray, of which Michel Angelo was so fond, is full of gravity and sublimity. This correspondency between sound and color, however, is wholly subjective, and may be to some extent visionary.

Objectively and constructively, music is analogous to architecture. The fundamental law of the latter is symmetry and proportion; that of the former, rhythm and harmony; but what those are in space, these are in time. Architecture is the symmetrical arrangement of a solid material,—metal, wood, or stone; music is the audible tone ringing off from this material in vibration. The physical body is architecture; the spiritual body is music. Thus the lowest of the speaking arts is only a spiritualization of the lowest of the imaging arts; and this is what Hegel meant when he defined music to be architecture translated from space into time. In it geometry rules over the tenderest emotions, and all its subtle harmonies are woven in a mathematical frame-work. Meyerbeer's Prophet rests on the theorems of Euclid. The same principles led to Kepler's Law and to Jenny Lind's Bird-song; and it is a fact perhaps worth considering, that the divisions of a musical string have a near correspondence to the relative distances of the planets from the sun; so that the Pythagorean doctrine of the harmony of the spheres may, after all, have a scientific basis. Vitruvius maintained that he who would excel as an architect must be also a musician; and Goethe in conversation with Eckermann (II. 88), calls architecture a petrified music, because the impressions produced by each are similar. The cathedral is a vast organ, whose melodies are fixed in stone, and reach the soul through the eye, instead of through the ear. Apparently there can be no greater contrast than the heavy massiveness of architecture, and the flowing, ever-changing tone-waves of music; yet they are intimately related, and the fitness of the temple music to the temple is complete, like the union of soul and body or the unity of thought and word.*

Historically also the tone and temper of every stage of culture and type of civilization are reflected in its music. It is well known that there is a great variety of keys, majors, minors, sharps, flats, &c., which are supposed to have a peculiar adaptation to the manifold moods of mankind; but the truth is, the musical ear of humanity changes from age to age, so that the same key is employed at different periods for different purposes. The fact that G minor in Schubert's Erlkönig is used to express a sentiment of heart-chilling horror, is no guaranty that it could be employed by a composer of the year 2000 to produce the same effect. Dorian music was in the key of D minor, but the firm and manly qualities which Aristotle and Athenæus attribute to it belong, according to our feeling, rather to C major, the key of Phrygian music. Thus we have literally made a leap a dorio ad phrygium. To the ear of the eighteenth century G major was a brilliant, ingratiating tone; and Kircher in his Musurgia Universalis, published in 1636, calls it tonum voluptuosum; by us, on the contrary, it is regarded as especially modest and naïve, although a little frivolous. Before the time of Calvisius, who lived in the sixteenth century, C major was the love-tone; but it is in A major that Mozart's Don Giovanni declares his passion to Zerline. In the seventeenth century D minor was the tone of holy serenity; with Gluck and Mozart it bears the stamp of brooding melancholy and dread, whereas in Weber's Der Freischütz it is the voice of wild demoniac vengeance and triumph. The publication of Goethe's Werther was followed by a morbid accumulation of sentimentality throughout all Europe, which gave rise to a multitude of love songs in the despairing, suicidal key of G minor; to such a degree is the music of any period a delicate pathometer, which de-

* It may seem strange at first sight, that, whilst there are women who have won fame as sculptors, painters, poets, and prose-writers, female genius appears to be wholly excluded from architecture and music, and we are unable to recall a single instance of a female architect or a female composer of any eminence. This is an additional evidence of the analogy between these arts, and is due to the fact that both of them rest on a mathematical basis.

rects the nature and measures the intensity of its emotions. The eighteenth century preferred the voices which are most nearly tuned to the violin. The artificial and enlascinated voice of the man who sang as if he had a small oboe in his throat was thought to be peculiarly fit for rendering lyric and dramatic music. We give preference to the brighter tones of the flute, the clarinet and the horn, to the splendor of burnished over that of molten gold. Tones and keys which a century ago were employed only to express the strongest emotions, are now applied on the most ordinary occasions; the spices and highly seasoned condiments of our ancestors have become our daily bread. This musical phenomenon corresponds also to the belief of some physiologists that the average human pulse has quickened about ten throbs per minute during the last half century; so that the fever-pulse of fifty years ago is the healthy working-pulse of to-day. This acceleration marks precisely the difference between a harp and a piano, between touching a string with the finger and hitting it with a hammer; and even our piano-forte music is more forte than piano. Quantz, who taught the flute to Frederic the Great, speaking of execution, says, "In adagio every note must be gently caressed." But the taste of to-day seems to demand that every note should be vigorously cuffed. In this age of over-excitement the ear has grown dull to the more subtle and delicate harmonies, as if it had been stunned by the din of railways and the whistle of steamboats; so that the brilliant music of a century ago is no longer brilliant to us. In order to produce the effect which it was meant to produce, we are obliged to increase the volume of the orchestra, and put two instruments where our grandfathers put only one. At this rate the next generation will be obliged to add a calliope. It is certain that since the days of Haydn and Handel the key of the flageolet has gone up a third, or even an octave.* This metamorphosis of the ear is one of the most curious facts in the history of music. We know not how it is that the eleventh century derived pleasure from the compositions of Guido da Arezzo, which, if performed in one of our concert-rooms, would drive the auditory from the house.

Music in England.

THE MUSICAL HISTORY OF THE YEAR 1866. (From the Choir and Musical Record.)

Among the most difficult tasks which we can well lay before the musical historian is that of stating the actual amount of progress made in the art during any particular year, and yet if our annual record does not shew some signs of progress, it must, by the very nature of things, tell of absolute retrogression, for in art as in religion there is no stationary position. Looking back, then, at the year 1866 from this special point of view, it is hard to say where any definite evidence has been given either of an improvement in the public taste or in popular musical education. There have not been wanting signs of the still powerful influence which the trash in music, as in literature, exerts over the minds of a large class of persons to whom the art is simply a vehicle for the retailing of bad jokes and the promulgation of insane specimens of anything but English poetry which a publisher would refuse even for a half-penny periodical, but which, under the guise of a song with the usual tumbtum accompaniment find an unlimited number of admirers. Although the Ballad Concerts, to which we have frequently referred, have thus done much to depress rather than elevate the people in the scale of musical existence, and although we cannot perhaps point to the establishment of any new form of concerts where really good music has been performed to counterbalance the evil, yet the interest excited by the Report on Musical Education issued by the Special Committee of the Society of Arts, and the subsequent changes at the Royal Academy of Music, give us good reason to hope that the year has not passed away without leaving some influence for good in its train, although it may not have been signalized by any momentous events, like the fiery showers which will render the year remarkable in the annals of the astronomical world.

Indeed, in the most important branch of the art,—Church Music,—we have great reason to congratulate ourselves on the retrospect of the past year. Our pages have been crowded with records of CHORAL FESTIVALS, not only in the noble cathedrals and abbeys, but in obscure country parishes where the clergy have been kindled into some degree of enthusiasm for the art, which has ever ranked not only next to Religion herself in its divine influences, but has been always regarded as one of her most powerful assistants in elevating men and raising their thoughts from earth to heaven.

Musical Education, in its general sense, is decidedly improving, though perhaps by slow degrees. The Royal Academy of Music, with our greatest English composer* at its head and one of the most eminent of foreigners who by long residence in, and hard work for our country, has won its "musical freedom," as his lieutenant,† will doubtless not only enlist a larger amount of public sympathy, and let us hope, receive a larger sum of the public money, but also provide, what at present we look in vain for—a genuine school of English artists capable of singing English music. Although, however, much may be done by this institution, with good management and an increased number of free scholarships, yet its work must always bear an infinitesimal proportion to the number of those throughout the length and breadth of the land who would not only be worthy of musical culture, but who, if trained as artists or composers, would do honor to our country. For musical education to become general, then, something more is required than the National Music School. We want the art taught as an art and not as a mere accomplishment in our ladies' schools and our public grammar schools; we want the clergy in every parish to do something for the musical education of their people; and we want the music of our homes to be raised in style and in performance. If all these requirements were fulfilled, or if even an honest attempt were made to begin to fulfil them, then the Royal Academy would have no lack of candidates, and the English would by degrees take high rank among the nations of the world as a musical people.

Turning to Italian Opera, which, although not the most important, is at any rate the most costly and most popular musical feast placed before the London public, we find that so far as relates to the production of novelties and the appearance of new artists, Her Majesty's Theatre bears the palm. Mr. Mapleson not only mounted Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, and Mozart's Il Seraglio, but revived Weber's Oberon, and Mozart's Nozze di Figaro; and although Gluck's opera was not "popular" enough to draw full houses, we can but give credit to the enterprising lessee for thus adding another link to the chain of masterpieces which he has brought forward since he has been at the theatre. Among the new vocalists, Signor Mongini, a tenore robusto, and Mr. Tom Hohner, a tenor of lighter style, were the only important debutants. The former was a valuable acquisition, and was equal to the hardest work of the season; but Mr. Hohner was unable to hold his ground, and soon retired into the more private life of the concert-room. Madame Grisi re-appeared once more, but only to prove what her best friends feared—that she was past work of such an arduous character, and her first was consequently her last appearance. Still holding the services of Mdle. Tietjens, Mdle. Ilma de Murska, Mdle. Sinico, and Mr. Santley, the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre was enabled to keep up a constant change of programme without the slightest fear of presenting an opera with an inefficient cast. At Covent Garden, the novelty provided was the little comic opera, Crispino e la Comare, by the Brothers Ricci, which was not of any great importance, the second new opera promised, Donizetti's Don Sebastiano, never getting any further than the announcement in that most dubious of guides—the prospectus of the forthcoming season. The only new artist of any note who appeared under Mr. Gye's auspices was Madame Vilda, who sang in Norma and other operas with great success. She has a soprano voice of great power, and a good style, but lacked ease as an actress. Mdle. Adelina Patti, Signor Mario, MM. Faure, and Naudin were the most important members of the staff.

English Opera breathed its last at Covent Garden early in the spring, and "left not a rack behind," except a few dresses and some stage property; the Royal English Opera Company thus coming to an untimely death; and as if everyone had become convinced that the production of national operas was a losing speculation, we have had no further attempts at its revival to record, Mr. Mellon only promising a comic operetta as a lever de rideau for his Christmas pantomime, which has outlived the opera.

The old Philharmonic Society steadily pursued its conservative course at the Hanover Square Rooms, under Dr. Sterndale Bennett's direction, and, as it has since appeared, this was to be his last season with the Society he has done so much to improve and benefit. Even here the influence of the now constantly increasing taste for the music of Schumann showed itself by the performance of his Cantata, Das Paradies und die Peri, at the first concert of the season; but it suffered in no small degree from the unsatisfactory way in which it was given. His piano-forte concerto was played at a later concert by Herr Jaell. Among the other soloists of the season were Herr Joachim and Mr. W. G. Cusins, the latter of whom has since been appointed conductor of the Society, a change which will, doubtless, not be unfruitful in the coming year; and although after Dr. Bennett's successful direction, the most excellent of musicians might well feel the greatness of the work he has to do, and almost doubt his own powers, yet we have great confidence that the Society will be well managed by its new head. At the New Philharmonic Concerts at S. James's Hall, there is little of absolute novelty to record. Schumann's E flat Symphony, Weber's clarinet Concerto (Mr. Lazarus,) Spohr's "Power of Sound," and Beethoven's C minor Symphony were among the great things done, while the soloists included Mr. J. F. Barnett and Herr Straus.

The Musical Society of London, under Mr. Alfred Mellon's direction, played, for the first time in London, Mr. Arthur Sullivan's new Symphony, No. 1, in E minor, which was produced a few weeks before at the Crystal Palace. Among the other novelties of the season was a concert solo for the clarinet and orchestra from the pen of Mr. Silas, admirably played by Mr. Lazarus. M. Wieniawski was among the soloists.

It is, however, to Mr. Manns and his now famous band at the Crystal Palace Concerts that we must award the place of honor in the history of the orchestral performances of the year 1866; for while the old London Societies contented themselves with keeping up their reputation without adding to their repertoire, he produced several works new to England, including Ferdinand Hiller's Cantata, Loreley; Gounod's hymn, S. Cecilia, in which M. Sainton played the violin solo; the Symphony mentioned above, by Mr. A. S. Sullivan, and the overture to his opera, the Sapphire Necklace, played for the first time at his benefit concert; Schubert's overture to Alfonse und Estrella; and the entr'actes to the same composer's Rosamunde. Among the larger works performed during the year, were Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht; Handel's Acis and Galatea, and his Alexander's Feast; Mozart's Il Seraglio; Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris; in both the latter works the vocalists were from Her Majesty's Theatre, Covent Garden not contributing any of the attractions to the opera concerts of 1866. Schumann shared the honors with the great masters, who were drawn upon freely for symphonies and overtures in right good Sydenham style.

Passing from the greater to the less we must glance at the manifest progress which instrumental chamber music is making amongst us. A few years ago the Musical Union was almost the only Society in existence for the purpose of providing the lovers of this special branch of music with a concert, and by its somewhat exclusive rules and high subscriptions it has for the last twenty years only catered for the upper ten thousand. And this we believe was more owing to the lack of desire on the part of the public than from any fault in the concert-givers. Now, however, the state of the case is changed. Mr. Arthur Chappell by means of his popular concerts has thoroughly impregnated us with a love of the string quartet, the purest form of musical composition, and his supporters, "the people," prove by their attendance and their steady attention to every note of the music, that he has rightly felt the popular pulse. Herr Joachim and his coadjutors have won for themselves a world-wide reputation, and not only on Monday nights, but on Saturday afternoons in S. James's Hall, and at provincial towns, has the same success attended them. Amateur quartet parties, too, are on the increase, and a new society under Herr Molique's direction is hard at work. The great want in this class of music seems to be a society for the practice of new compositions, (similar to that of the Musical Society of London, for the trial of orchestral music,) for although prizes are offered by the Society of British Musicians and are gained by many deserving writers, among whom we may specially mention Mr. E. Prout, B.A., yet, with the exception of one semi-public performance, their works seem to be shelved, and, of course, we cannot blame Mr. Ella or Mr. Chappell for remaining steadfast to the great classics. A monthly performance of new works by a competent party of instrumentalists would, we feel sure, be a stimulus to young composers which is much wanted at the present time, especially in this country where public honors to musicians are so seldom bestowed. Mr. Ella's season was rendered noteworthy by the performance of four new and promising pianists, M. Fienier from the Paris Conservatoire, Mr. Hartvigson, a Dane, Mdle. Gayard Pacini, and Mdle. Trautmann, both first prize pupils from Paris. Herr Auer, and Herr Wieniawski were the leading violinists, Her Goffric taking the violin in the place of the late Mr. Henry Webb; Signor Piatti still held his post as violoncellist. The programmes were of the usual excellent character. At the Monday Popular Concerts the pieces played for the first time were Haydn's Quartets in G major, Op. 76, No. 1, and in E flat, Op. 33, No. 2, and his Trio in C; Spohr's Duo Concertante in G minor for pianoforte and violin; Dussek's Sonata, "The farewell;" Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Op. 35; Mozart's Quartet in E flat; Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in F sharp major, Op. 78; Mozart's Divertimento in G major for strings and two French horns; and Schubert's Grand Pianoforte Sonata in A major. Thus Mr. Chappell has worked well through the year, and having gained possession of S. James's Hall earlier this year than he did in 1865, he has been enabled to give an ante-Christmas season.

The great Choral Societies, devoted to the production of oratorios and large works of a similar nature, give little to record. Both the Sacred Harmonic Society and the National Choral Society are very much in the same position as last year; neither have left the beaten track, although the older society has revived Haydn's Seasons and performed some Masses, which were perhaps intended as a sop for those who, like ourselves, charge the committee with apathy and indifference to the requirements of the public in this class of music, which, so long as the many noble and yet unknown works are left on the shelf, will not be satisfied.

In Glees and Part-Songs, Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir still reigns supreme, and, indeed, we may add in solitary grandeur, for it has had no competitor; and that this should be the case in a nation which owns the greatest glee and madrigal writers amongst its musical worthies, is a matter of regret, and is moreover a proof that conductors are not awake to the wants of the day, as the support Mr. Leslie has received gives proof that if another choir could attain, by equally diligent practice, to the same state of efficiency, it would soon gain favor. We still have amongst us men able to write a good part-song, and this makes it an additional cause for regret that there are so few choirs able to sing them as they ought to be sung. Among the novelties produced by Mr. Leslie were Mr. Salaman's eight-part setting of the 29th Psalm; a quaint Christmas coral by Mr. Silas; with anthems by Messrs. Barnby and Leslie, and Dr. Wesley. There were two Lenten Concerts with rich programmes; and the last subscription performance was entitled a Madrigal Concert, chiefly on account of the programme including the three compositions which gained the prizes offered by the Bristol Madrigal Society in 1865:—Mr. Leslie's "Hark! how the winds," Mr. W. J. Westbrook's "All is not gold," and Mr. Lahee's "Thine eyes so bright," none of which created any great impression. In the suburbs several societies have been working quietly and steadily in Mr. Leslie's steps, among which we may specially mention the Islington Vocal Union and the Canonbury Vocal Union.

The Concordia Choir, for the production of little-known masterpieces, performed Cherubini's Requiem Mass in C minor, at the Hanover Square Rooms, and, although, considering the difficulty of the work and the absence of any brass instruments, it was tolerably satisfactory, the conductor, Mr. W. Volckman, has resigned his post, not receiving the support he expected. Among the other smaller societies which have devoted their time to choral music we may mention the West London Madrigal Society, the West Central Choral Society, the Hullah Choral Society, the West London Sacred Choral Society, and the City Sacred Harmonic Society.

Among the private enterprises of the year none deserves more honorable mention than Mr. Charles Halle's Pianoforte Recitals, at which he gave the whole series of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas. M. Wieniawski and Mr. G. A. Osborne gave an excellent programme at their benefit concert. Madame Sainton-Dolby gave several Ballad Concerts with programmes composed chiefly of the modern style. Mr. Alfred Mellon's Promenade Concerts, which have filled up the autumn and winter months, have been characterized by all their usual attractions though with the exception of the Thursday evening programmes of classical music there had been little of interest to any but the lovers of popular songs and dance music.

The Provincial Festivals were eminently successful. The Three Choirs at Worcester produced nothing worthy of note beyond the stereotyped oratorios and secular concerts; but at Norwich Mr. Benedict contributed a Cantata, S. Cecilia, and Mr. Sullivan a concert overture, both of which were very successful. Handel's Passion Music was included in the scheme.

The annals of Musical Literature still show an improvement. Several valuable works have been issued during the year, including "Beethoven's Letters," translated by Lady Wallace, and Herr Engel's "Introduction to the Study of National Music." The musical journals, too, have been altered to some extent, the Choir and Musical Record having adopted a fortnightly, and the Musical Standard a weekly issue.

Although, therefore, the signs of absolute progress have been few and far between in the year that is past, still we have not been standing still. Our societies have kept up their standard of excellence, in so far as the style of performance goes; and it is only in the absence of new or unknown works from their programmes that we have any fault to find. In fact, before a well-grounded change can be made either in the musical tastes of the English people, or in the programmes of their concerts, we must have a solid improvement in the education, both at our private schools and in our public institutions.

Music Abroad.

HALLE. The Orchestra has the following letter from this old town, dated Dec. 18, 1866. It will interest the admirers of Handel and of Robert Franz.

This fortunate town is the birthplace of immortal Handel, the man whose works, impressed with the mark of rare power, will last as models of inspiration and science. The great project of building a large music hall, exclusively dedicated to the performance of his works, having been abandoned for want of money, a very modest monument was with difficulty erected in the middle of the principal market-place of Halle, bearing a bronze statue of mediocre merit. On one side of the pedestal are written the following words:—"ERRICHTET VON SEINEN VEREHRERN IN DEUTSCHLAND UND ENGLAND." Two great nations, after having made so great a noise about Handel, have joined together to bring out this puny result! In fact, only a few pounds came over from England; the Queen sent £50 and the Prince Consort £25. In Germany altogether there was collected about 400 thalers, and the greatest part of the expense was supported by the inhabitants of Halle, each piously bringing his mite towards the sacred undertaking. In 1857 Jenny Lind sang the "Messiah" in the said town, devoting the receipts of the concert to the Handel monument. In the same year, the sculptor, H. Heidel, from Berlin, made the model of the statue. On the 14th July, 1859, the statue was discovered, and "Samsen" given in the market church, under the leadership of Doctor Robert Franz. Upon the desk, on which the statue of Handel leans, lies the score of the "Messiah." Heidel refused any payment for his work, his expenses excepted, asking only as compensation that the statue might be cleaned every month, so as to retain a good color. This very modest desire of the artist having fallen into oblivion, the pigeons and sparrows have colored the head and coat of bronzed Handel in their own peculiar way.

The market people, who were furious at the beginning, because the monument in question interfered with their usual arrangements, are now reconciled to it and utilize the steps round it to sell their cabbages, carrots, potatoes, &c. This famous type of the femmes de la Halle of Halle could not understand why the English people should send money for the monument of Handel; and as about here a pork-butcher called Händschel is very celebrated for his capital sausages, they asked ingeniously if Handel got the monument for having improved the manufacture of sausages in England!

Musical pitch does not stand very high in Halle, in consequence of the indifference of the rich. The town is poor and does literally nothing for music. However, there is a very fine orchestra, a Stadtmusikdirector, and a Doctor der Musik at the University. The first of these gentlemen, Herr Sohn, is an industrious musician, who derives a hundred thalers a year salary from the town, and makes his living out of teaching and letting-out the orchestra, which is engaged at his own cost. As there are two concert societies and a theatre, Herr Sohn organizes a new orchestra every winter, and lets it out on hire. The second gentleman, Robert Franz, is one of the great living German composers. His Lieder are celebrated in Germany and America; and he is famous for ancient music in general and for Bach in particular. He has already arranged and published ten cantatas, six duets, four collections of airs for soprano, tenor, contralto, and bass by Bach, and is going to publish at Härtel's a newly-arranged Passion by the same composer. I have also seen a very fine edition of a Magnificat by Durante, and a Subst. Mater by Astorga, also arranged by Franz. The principal occupation of Dr. Franz is teaching and lecturing on music at the University. I have had the chance of making his acquaintance, and found in him a highly interesting philosopher and musician, of simple manners. Unfortunately, through the explosion of an engine at a railway station many years ago his hearing became deranged.

The two concert societies of Halle are directed by Sohn and Franz alternately, and both gentlemen are capital leaders. One of the two societies is a subscription concert society, open to the public at large, and the other is a private association, called die Berggesellschaft, which is no other than a freemasons' society. The first-named concerts are given in the fine and large room of the Communal School; the others are given in the room of the lodge. I was present at the second concert of the Berggesellschaft on the 14th instant, and must confess that I was agreeably surprised by the capital execution of the orchestra under Herr Sohn. The first part of the concert was filled by the charming symphony in B flat major of Niels W. Gade, one of the best of our modern instrumental composers, and an artist not sufficiently known in England. His music, without possessing great proportions, is rich in fine thoughts, scored in a masterly manner. In the second part of the program we had the well-known overture of the "Genoveva" by R. Schumann.

LEIPZIG.—On the evening of the 12th Dec., the Direction of the Conservatoire here gave a soirée musicale par invitation in honor of the King of Saxony's birth-day. First came a chorus for male voices, "Salvum fac regem," expressly composed for the occasion by Mr. Nathan B. Emanuel, from Birmingham, a pupil of the Conservatoire of Leipzig. Although the somewhat uncertainty of form and the crudity in the modulations of this work show want of experience in the young composer, it is not devoid of invention. A quartet by Schumann, for stringed instruments (No. 1. in A minor), played by four pupils, gave evidence of the good school still prevailing at this celebrated old establishment. The same may be said about the execution of a quintet for stringed instruments, composed by Reinecke (the Kapellmeister of the Gewandhaus) which was the morceau brillant of the programme. A concerto-pastorale for the pianoforte, by Moscheles, and an adagio and fugue for violin, were excellently performed by R. Heckmann from Mannheim, and Mr. Davidoff from Petersburg. Another very different, "Salvum fac regem" for male chorus, composed by R. Heckmann, closing the concert, proved that this young gentleman is a better pianist than a composer.

The eighth Gewandhaus Concert was almost entirely (?) devoted to R. Schumann's compositions, Mme. Schumann being the only artist engaged on the occasion. A Concert-Overture of Jadassohn, (manuscript) directed by the composer himself, met with a very cold reception on the part of the public. The title Concert-Overture is in no way in keeping with the form of this very pale composition, which may be better denominated an Allegro, primo tempo, from a symphony. Not a single new melodic idea, not a single new instrumental effect is to be met with in the entire work. In a word, this composition is a very good exemplar of the modern rational school. The concerto for piano and orchestra (No. 2. D minor) of Mendelssohn was beautifully performed by Mme. Schumann. The two movements from a Symphony of F. Schubert (manuscript), which were played afterwards, are very far from being so great as the Viennese papers would make out, and nothing to be compared with better works of the great composer, as for example, the Symphony in C major. The effect produced upon the audience by these fragments was a succès d'estime—that is, a very cold one. A Prelude of T. Kirchner, Scherzo, and "Träumswirren" of R. Schumann, were magnificently executed by Mme. Schumann, who, on being vociferously recalled, played a charming romance in D minor, composed by her husband. The symphony by Schumann (No. 1. in B flat major), capably performed by the orchestra, brought the concert to an end.

At the next Gewandhaus Concert, I hear they are going to give the celebrated "Ballade," for solos and male chorus, the Frithjof of Max Bruch (author of the Opera Loreley), with Signor Marchesi as the hero (Frithjof). Signor Marchesi—who has been a great favorite hero for many years—sang already with great success in the Gewandhaus concerts on the 6th instant. A real treat was the fourth soirée für Kammermusik in the Gewandhaus on Saturday last, Mme. Schumann being the pianist, and the Herren Concertmeister David, Röntgen (violin), Hermann (viola), Hegar (violoncello), Guenpert (horn). The ever-charming quartet for stringed instruments in A minor (Op. 29), by Schubert, executed to perfection, was the gem of the evening. Not so charming, but very interesting was the quartet in F major (No. 2), by Schumann. On the other hand a trio for piano, violin and horn, by S. Brahms, one of the modern composers who try to replace the real inspiration of musical thoughts by eccentricity and extravagance, was positively tiresome. The masterly execution of David, Mme. Schumann, and Guenpert could not help to transform this mass of heterogeneous sounds into a musical sympathetic unity. The last number of the programme was a fantaisie for piano, in three parts (Op. 17) by Schumann, played by Mme. Schumann.

COLOGNE.—Of an uncommon interest was our Gürzenich concert; the great oratorio, in three parts, of F. Hiller, Saul, being produced for the first time here. It was first given in 1857, at the musical festival in Düsseldorf, and later in Vienna, Wiesbaden, and Basle. F. Hiller, following the progress of the musical art with its new instrumental resources, had already taken, in the first oratorio, Die Zerstörung von Jerusalem, the same path traced by Mendelssohn, especially in the Paulus, attempting to conciliate the pure religious feeling with the dramatical forms and worldly expression required by our present musical taste. In Saul he has made a great step forward, so that this very beautiful work is more to be called a "Biblical Drama" than an oratorio. The impression on the occasion was grand. Many numbers, however, having been generally appreciated as exceptional, can be already pointed out as the morceaux brillants of the work in question. To this category belong (in the first part) the recitative and aria (David, "O, holde Jungfrau," for tenor; the soprano solo (Michal); and female chorus, "Weckt ihn nicht;" the recitative and solo for bass (Samuel), "König Israels;" and a charming little duet for soprano and tenor (Michal and Jonathan) "Vater Gottes, Zorneswölke." In the second part was remarkable the solo for soprano (Michal), "O du den meine Seele liebet;" and sublime was the recitative and air for baritone (Saul), "Lasst von Verfolgung ab." The "Trauermarsch" in the third part is a real musical gem. The libretto, from the celebrated pen of Moritz Hartmann, is as capital for the form as elevated for the style. The execution under the leadership of the great composer was perfect, and the splendid choruses of the Saul were capably rendered, for precision of intonation and rhythm. The soli were entrusted to the Herren Hill, from Frankfurt, baritone; Schild, from Leipzig, tenor; Krolow from the opera-house here, bass; and the Fräuleins Ehmanns, soprano, and Kneip, alto—both pupils of the Conservatoire of Cologne.

Chamber Concerts.

"SCHUMANN SOIREEs." The young pianist, Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, gave the first of his four soirées, in which he intends to make the piano works of Schumann the conspicuous feature, on Thursday evening, Jan. 3, at Chickering's Hall. The audience was large, and the concert proved in the main one of rare and special interest. The artist showed good tact in the making up of his programme:

Fantaisie. Op. 17.....	Schumann.
Scena and Aria (Ah! perfido spergiuro).....	Beethoven.
Mrs. H. M. Smith.
Sonata, C minor (for Violin and Piano).....	Beethoven.
Mr. Henry Suck and Carlyle Petersilea.
a. How oft the young have wandered.....	Mendelssohn.
b. Dedication.....	Schumann.
Mrs. H. M. Smith.
Fantaisie. Op. 15.....	Schubert.

The selection from Schumann's piano-forte works, although but a single one, is equal to a large Sonata in length, and in richness and variety of matter in its three elaborate and interesting movements.

It was a well-chosen specimen, showing the individuality of Schumann, his genius (struggling with form), his depth of nature well. Hitherto we had heard only single movements of it in the concert room, and were now glad of an opportunity to hear the whole. We think it fully justifies all that is said of it by Wasielewski in the extracts which we translate on our first page today. It was an arduous task for the interpreter, but Mr. Petersilea seemed fully master of it, and presented it in all its breadth and contrasts as a clear, consistent, vigorous whole; the bold march-like movement of the second part, and the delicate dreamy, musing passages elsewhere made themselves fully felt. It was admirable execution, tempered by true taste, and spent upon a worthy subject, a noble and significant work which had been thoroughly and intelligently studied.

The Schubert Fantaisie made a fine counter-part to it. Indeed a more effective, characteristic illustration of Schubert's quality could hardly have been chosen; it seemed to us that there was more of Schubert's best power in it (certainly more of that power which an audience readily appreciates) than in either of the Sonatas yet presented in Mr. Perabo's "Schubert" concerts. It opens large and broad, as if sketched for an orchestral work; and it develops in Sonata form almost, only without pause between all the movements. The manner in which the mind is gradually prepared for the introduction of his "Wanderer" melody (Adagio), excites strong expectation, and the song is harmonized and worked out with wonderful power and beauty.

Then follows a delicate Presto in Scherzo form; and for a Finale a bold Allegro sets in in fugued style, which we find a little hard and dry and tedious in its length. The whole was played with firm, brilliant, even power.

The Beethoven Sonata suffered by some difficulty of keeping the violin always in tune; this must have been accidental, for Mr. Suck commonly plays as true as any one. Otherwise it was finely rendered.

Mrs. SMITH's large, clear soprano tones—the higher ones especially—told well in Beethoven's Scena in Italian operatic style; it was a brilliant, but cold rendering. Schumann's "Dedication" (Du meine Seele, Du mein Herz!) was taken altogether too slowly and deliberately for a song of such fiery, impatient passion; neither singer nor accompanist (Mr. J. A. HOWARD), who played the other songs well, appeared to enter into the spirit of this piece. The serious Mendelssohn air was very well done.—The Soirée as a whole was one of the most unique and interesting chamber concerts we have had for some time.

Mr. Petersilea's second Soirée (Thursday of this week) must wait further notice. We can only allude now to the programme, which has more of Schumann in it, namely: The Sonata in F-sharp minor (spoken of on our first page), the Concerto (Mr. LANG playing the accompaniments on a second piano), and the Variations for two pianos. Also two movements of Chopin's E-minor Concerto; and songs by Schumann, Schubert and Mendelssohn, sung by Miss EDITH ABELL.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The second subscription concert (Tuesday evening, Jan. 8) was one of the most delightful in the whole eighteen years history of the Club. The Chickering Hall was crammed, and the scene was doubly genial by reason of the re-appearance of many old musical faces whose presence had been missed for some years past. This also made the music sound the better, in spite of Handel's often quoted saying about the empty music hall. But the music was all decidedly good, both in matter and in presentation, thoroughly enjoyable to cultivated and refined tastes, as well as to the crowd in general. It consisted of these four interesting works by four masters:

Quintet in E flat. Op. 4.....	Beethoven.
Sonata, for Piano and Violin, in B flat.....	Dussek.
First time in Boston. Messrs. Lang and Schultze.
Quartet in A. No. 3. Op. 41.....	R. Schumann.
Piano Trio in D Minor. Op. 49.....	Mendelssohn.

We thought we never had heard Mr. LANG play more admirably, never with such real fervor, force and delicacy, such thorough unity and vividness of conception, such fusion of all the details (finely clear as they separately were) in the pervading spirit of the whole, or with so sympathetic and musical a touch, so free from mere material brilliancy and dash, as he did in the Mendelssohn Trio. The work itself is one of the most perfect in form as well as genial in invention of all Mendelssohn's creations. The ideas, beautiful in themselves and pregnant, become completely clarified and as it were transfigured in the consummate working up. It was feast enough for one memorable evening to hear that old favorite again. The Sonata by Dussek, in a lighter, more old-fashioned style altogether, carrying you back to Haydn, Mozart and Clementi, but altogether spontaneous, limpid, graceful in its flow, and very naïve, purely a piano-forte work (as pianos were in that day), presented a very different task, yet one almost as difficult in its way, and was alike happy in the rendering. Mr. Schultze played the violin part very nicely, especially the beautiful cantabile episode which his instrument has in the middle of the Allegretto (if we remember rightly).

Of the newer matter, the Schumann Quartet was of course the point of especial interest. It was first performed here, by the Club, in November, 1862, and was repeated once or twice soon after with increasing interest. This time it was remarkably well played and was appreciated by a much wider circle. We can only recall our old impression of it (1862), which we find now in no way essentially qualified:

Alike in the inventive and imaginative qualities of genius, and in artistic handling of ideas and instruments; alike in inspiration and in counterpoint, in poetic substance, feeling, and in form, it is one of the most rewarding Quartets one can listen to and study. From beginning to end it is full of matter,—we mean musical ideas, all fine, original and fresh; there is not a common-place bar or cadence in it; nothing feebly said at second hand; nothing which does not somehow seem to open your mental vision, as when you come in contact with a fresh, clear soul. In the mere matter of part-writing it is as free and clear and natural, while finely complicated, as Mozart almost; no part in another's way, nor in its own way; no part wondering why it is there. The counterpoint is all transparent, a mingling of currents each alive. Then as to the instruments, significant and lovely passages, now in the 'cellos, now the tenor, &c., lie on the open strings, so that the sound thereof is marrowy and goes (vibrates) to its mark. The first theme of the Allegro, consisting of a sort of pointed invitation of two notes (foreshadowed in a few bars of introductory Andante of exquisitely pensive harmony,) and a phrase of graceful, airy melody for answer, is presently offset by a counter theme sung in some one of the parts, while the others catch their breath in the rather nice task of accompanying; and these, with wayside and connecting thoughts, are developed into a beautiful and rich poetic whole.

The second movement (Assai agitato) is a succession of distinct, delicately quaint thoughts, all pointedly and briefly hinted as it were; among them a short fugue, and a bold motive (tempo risoluto) in which the frisky instruments leap about for a while with a vivacity that made us think of Handel's frogs; but what page of four-part music can be more ideally lovely, as if written for the fairy Fine-ear, than that which follows, and in which the series subsides and murmurs to a close! We will not dare to speak of the Adagio, save to say that in its profoundly serious mood there is nothing to overcome one with drowsiness, and that it does not fall below one's expectation of the Adagio in a work all so admirable. The Finale is in that old narrative ballad-like strain, to which Schumann takes so naturally, beginning with a jaunty, quaint refrain, which recurs after each stage of the finely diversified and fascinating story. But what we have said is nothing; perhaps some time we shall attempt a fuller description of the contents of this Quartet. Meanwhile who does not long to hear it still again?

The fine old Beethoven Quintet opened the feast delectably, bringing back memories of our best musical days.—The third concert will come Feb. 5, with ERNST PERABO for pianist.

THIRD "SCHUBERT PIANO MATINEE." The interest in the young pianist, ERNST PERABO, does not fall off at all, but only spreads and deepens, as the large and eager attendance on Thursday afternoon (Jan. 10) proved. His programme was as unique and full of novelty as ever, in many respects extremely interesting. If our friend, in his desire to give us just those works of great masters which are little known or seldom heard (for which opportunity we sincerely thank him) includes some in his programmes which cannot rank among their most important works, yet he does it with such hearty conviction, he is so interested himself in what he does, not thinking of mere effect, and he has such a purely musical way of playing everything which he remembers (and he remembers every thing which he likes, and likes nothing which is not, to say the least, good), that it is sure to charm. We may question the judgment, but we must yield ourselves to the music; and we are pretty sure to have learned something of the composers, both the style and the distinctive inner man of each, and to have felt some new revelations of the meaning of all music, such as only music knows how to express.

His playing on this occasion, we may say once for all, was as nearly perfect as we can ask to hear. These were the selections:

Prelude and Fugue in E major, Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach. Duet for Piano and Clarinet, (Op. 15 in E flat major), N. Burgmüller, "Thou art the rest," Schubert. "Now the shades are falling," Franz. Sonata, Op. 120 (in A major). Three movements, Schubert. "Ye faded flowers," Schubert. Fifteen Variations with Fugue, Op. 85, E flat major, Beethoven.

The Bach Preludes and Fugues, particularly the long Fugue in A minor from the First Book, were highly edifying; played with fine accent, perfectly clear and even. One's musical sense is clearer after such an exercise of listening; calmly alive to delicate impressions that may follow; for Bach is both fine and essentially healthy. The Burgmüller Duet seemed not much more than a musician-like and graceful composition, rather common-place in point of inspiration; but nicely rendered by both instruments; Mr. RYAN's clarinet tone was more sweetly subdued, less glaring than sometimes of old.

Another Schubert Sonata, and another of the minor ones in point of ideal or artistic importance. Thus far Mr. Perabo has not given us one of the half dozen greatest among Schubert's Sonatas, such as that first one in A minor, the other one in A major, the one beginning with the broad, superb Fantasia in G, &c. No doubt these will come in time; meanwhile we are bound to suppose he has his own good reasons for the selection he is making; and we for one own to being glad of opportunities to hear all, even the less striking works of a composer who is always individual, and whose pen cannot help but leave the gleam of genius on the page.

The first Allegro of this smaller Sonata in A major has a graceful, softly gliding melody and is delicately breathed upon the canvass. The Andante is in a sweetly pensive, serious vein, with two or three interesting surprises by a change of key. The Finale is a bright, piquant, happy Rondo, full of arch vivacity. Altogether a very pleasing work, characteristic too, and wonderfully well played.

But what we have most to thank the concert-giver for this time is the Beethoven Variations on two themes which he has used also as the foundation of the last part of the Heroic Symphony; the second and more melodious one appears originally in his music to the ballet: "The Men of Prometheus." Very pregnant themes both, and in the hands here of a great master of the Variation art. But these are hardly Variations in the same creative sense with the 33 on a Waltz by Diabelli, and the 32 on a theme in C minor. Those are variations of the thought, poetic, logical developments thereof, as well as of the form; these are more of the ornamental, formal kind, but opening richer and richer as they go on and full of the true Beethoven power. It was a great treat to hear the neglected work so ably and inspiringly brought out.

Miss BENNETT (a pupil, we believe of Mrs. HARWOOD) has caught not a little of that lady's genuine song expression; the character and spirit of the fine selections you felt to be there. The voice, musical and sweet in its essential quality, seemed somehow pinched and slightly nasal in its habit of delivery; but perhaps the timidity of a debut had much to do with it, for occasionally in passages where she gave herself out with full abandon the tones were as clear and searching as one could desire. Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh" is one of the most pure and spiritual songs ever written, and one of the most difficult to render truly; all the more credit, then, to the young singer and to the accompanist, Mr. J. B. SHARLAND.

Perabo's fourth Matinée will be on the 31st of this month.

A concert of unusual interest will be that of Mrs. J. S. CARY, our contralto, who has done such excellent service in the Oratorios, and than whom we have no singer of a more genuine artistic character or more respected personally. It will take place in the Music Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 30. She has engaged an orchestra, with Mr. ZERRAHN as conductor, and hopes to have the Seventh Symphony performed. CAMILLA URSO, Miss HOUSTON, and Mr. J. C. D. PARKER will assist, and there will be a fine selection of pieces vocal and instrumental. Let no true friend of music fail to go.

TOO MUCH AT ONCE. This week brings upon us an avalanche of music, (the avalanche of snow now sweeping down on us from the north-east (Thursday) furnishes the image).

To-night, for instance, we have first Petersilea's "Schumann Soiree;" also Italian Opera ("L'Etoile du Nord"); then, as if this were not enough, suddenly re-appears the Bateman troupe, PARFA, ROSA, HATTON, MILLS and all, for three "farewell" concerts, heralded by rumors of strange new plans and alliances, all too bewildering to think of now. Then to-morrow comes the "Symphony Concert," with CAMILLA URSO and Schumann Symphony; and more opera and more Bateman night by night and afternoon too;—all of which falls after our going to press, which is (was) two days before date of publication.

The fifth SYMPHONY CONCERT (March 1) offers the ever welcome Gade Symphony in C minor; another Cherubini Overture (to "The Water Carrier," or "Les deux Journées"), and Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas." Mr. LANG will be the pianist, and play a Beethoven Concerto—not one of the three we heard last year, but an earlier one, in B flat, and that same Schubert Fantasia we have talked about above, as worked up into an orchestral and piano piece by Liszt.

The Harvard Musical Association are making arrangements for an extra Symphony Concert in aid of the Greeks, to send food to the women and children of the Cretans. Many of our best musicians offer their services most heartily, and the programme will embrace music suggestive of classic Greece in its days of glory ("Antigone" choruses, &c.); selections from Mozart's "Seraglio" and from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," suggestive of the Turks; and end with the Fifth Symphony, full of grand hope and triumph. Particulars soon.

MARSTEN'S ITALIAN OPERA opened at the Boston Theatre on Monday with Rosini's "Barber." The delicious music was exquisitely relished by a very large and appreciative audience. RONCONI, in spite of apology for hoarseness, sang as well as usual and acted the mercurial Figaro with inimitable vivacity and truth. Miss KELLOGG has not the kind of voice, the warm rich mezzo-soprano quality, which we associate with Rosina, and had of course to treat the part in her own way; but she sang the music with wonderful fluency and finish and acted with a great deal of pretty espérance. Sig. BARAGLI is no Mario, but he showed finely finished execution in the florid music of Almaviva, though now and then with painful straining. ANTONUCCI as Basilio and BELLINI as Dr. Bartolo were satisfactory in the main. More hereafter.

SOCIAL REUNION.—The pupils of Professor F. B. OLIVER, of the MENDELSSOHN MUSICAL INSTITUTE, No. 26 Oxford street, in this city, had a social reunion on Monday evening last. A large number, both young and old, met together to congratulate each other upon the progress they had made under Mr. Oliver's care. Some of the young ladies sang extracts from celebrated composers in most excellent voice and taste. It was refreshing to hear music rendered strictly in accordance with the text, without the usual obnoxious slurs and slides.

The company were entertained with ices, cakes, fruits, &c., and all were highly delighted. Prof. Oliver's method of teaching meets with the approbation of all good musicians, and we are glad to learn that he is having large success.—Transcript.

NEW YORK. The Philharmonic Society has met with a great loss in the resignation of its President, Mr. WILLIAM SCHARFENBERG, (senior partner of the music firm of Scharfenberg & Luis,) who was one of the founders of the Society, an excellent artist, always ranking among the best classical pianists in the country. The musical firm is dissolved, and Mr. Scharfenberg intends to spend the winter in Havana. There are hints that he will make Germany his home again; but we trust that he will not finally forsake the country of his adoption, where for some twenty years he has identified himself with every good interest of Art, a true American in his ideas, a loyal, philanthropic, useful gentleman.

Mr. THEO. THOMAS's third Symphony Soirée, must have been an occasion of much interest, for he had an Orchestra of 80 performers, with the assistance of the Mendelssohn (choral) Union, under Mr. Berge's direction, and his programme contained: A new Suite in C, op. 101, by Raff; Mozart's Ave verum corpus; the Overture, Chorus: "Arise and shine, and Choral: "Sleepers, wake," from St. Paul and Schumann's D-minor Symphony.

A new experiment of German Opera is in progress, at the Thalia Theatre, in Broadway. The company is a union of the scattered artists of the late German and French troupes of Grover and Juignet, and the engagement runs and from the 2nd January, to the 15th April, 1867. They will give German and French operas, but principally German. The principal singers are: Mme. Frederici, Mlle. Naddi, and Mlle. Seelig, from Hanover, prime donne; Mles. Dziuba & Laurentis, soubrettes; Theresa Bonconsiglio, contralto; Franz Himmer and Jean Armand, tenors (in heroic parts); Wilhelm Groaschel, lyric tenor, from Zürich; Paul de Surmont, tenor; Wilhelm Formes and Franz Wilhelm, baritones; Joseph Chandon, from Stuttgart, and Jean Vert, basses. Herr Neuendorf is Conductor. Among the pieces already given are Faust, Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, and Der Freyschütz. The Faust is described as an indifferent performance after what we have had by the old Grover troupe; Herr Himmer and his wife (Frederici) being the best part of it, and Mr. Chandon not making good the place of Hermann. Some of the performances are said to be "fully as good as those of the late German Opera." Of that of Don Juan the Weekly Review says:

Miss Seelig sang at the last Philharmonic concert with more assurance than success, and we are happy that, although her assurance has not decreased, her success is more deserved in opera. Her impersonation of Donna Anna in "Don Juan" was very satisfactory, although it seemed highly improbable that a lady of her imposing figure and manifest strength would let a small Don Juan like Mr. Formes go so easily as she did. She sang with a great deal of vigor and good conception of the music. Her voice is not as carefully trained as might be wished, but she must have been a very meritorious singer some years ago, and to-day she still retains some very good artistic qualities. Mr. Groschel, who arrived here with very good recommendations, has not realized our expectations. He is a singer of a very good school, carefully trained, and just such an artist as would be an excellent singing teacher; but he has neither dramatic power, nor even the appearance of an operatic singer. Some of his notes are very pleasing, especially in the middle register, but as soon as he arrives at those notes which ought to be quite easily sung with the chest by a tenor, he has to use the falsetto. This he uses very well in a few tones, and rather badly in the upper register, his high A and B being evidently pressed and betraying the effort which it costs him to produce them. We cannot consider the acquisition of this artist a surprisingly great one. Mr. Chandon is evidently just the opposite of Mr. Groschel. In possession of a very agreeable, not too strong, but sufficiently pliable voice, whose compass stretches over two octaves, Mr. Chandon has no more idea of stage business than a New Zealander has of kid gloves. To him it seems to be all the same whether he plays the part of Leporello, or of Caspar in the "Freischütz." His fine voice is occasionally a redeeming feature, but it is pitiable that Mr. Chandon should not possess the slightest talent for his profession, as a dramatic singer. Next week we are promised "Le Nozze di Figaro" and Glaeser's old opera "Des Adler's Horst." The impresario of the enterprise, Mr. Armand, has also taken charge of the French opera troupe, and that company will continue their performances. Madame Naddie singing in both companies.

HARTFORD, CONN. Of the recent performance of Costa's Eli, by the Beethoven Society a correspondent writes us:

"The rendering of the choruses and some of the solos was superior to that given in May. The principal Tenor part was given to Mr. Farley, who unfortunately was not well posted, and had a severe cold; while Dr. Guilmette's engagement in Boston was so important that he could not afford time to attend a rehearsal, and came upon the stage to sing his "role" to some extent unprepared; the effectiveness of his performance you can well imagine. He sang magnificently in the spring. Neither was the Orchestra as good as we have been accustomed to listen to. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, the wonderful and electric power and vitality infused into the choral part by the Society, made up for the imperfections in the solo portions. The lovely and interesting part of Samuel was sung by Miss Gertrude Frankau, with great sweetness and grace; the Evening Prayer in particular was remarkably effective. No less excellent was Miss Ellen Miller in the part of Hannah. The fair debutante possesses a fine mezzo soprano voice, as well as musical expression. "I will extol thee," was sung by our young and rising prima donna, Miss Campbell. Great praise must be awarded to Mr. J. G. BARNETT, for his training of the chorus and resident solo singers; they all seem to be inspired by his extraordinary vitality and power. To his great skill, care and judgment in conducting his orchestra and singers, are we indebted for this as well as many other great and intellectual musical banquets."

PHILADELPHIA. The Germania Orchestra give their public Saturday Afternoon Rehearsals still. Here is one of the last programmes:

Overture, Les Abencérages (first time).....Cherubini.
Eulogy of Tears (by request).....Schubert.
Elle Dances, Waltz.....Lanner.
Allegretto from Seventh Symphony.....Beethoven.
Overture, Fair Melusine (by request).....Mendelssohn.
Duet from Brewer of Preston (first time).....Adam.
First Finale from Shipwreck of the Melina.....Reisiger.

The Bateman troupe were here last week, giving two "farewell" concerts.

ST. LOUIS. The Philharmonic Society, conducted by A. Waldauer, gave its second concert at Philharmonic Hall, Dec. 20. The programme included: Overture to Der Freyschütz; Chorus from Elijah: "Blessed are the men who fear Him;" Violin solo, Fantasia brillante d'Otello, by Ernst; Four-part song: "Festival of Spring," by Kalliwoda; Andante and Minuet from Beethoven's 1st Symphony; Trio from Roberto Devereux; Overture, "The Wood Nymph," by Bennett; "Inflammatus," from Rossini's Stabat Mater.

SUCCESSFUL MUSICAL CONVENTION. The Fourth Annual New Hampshire State Musical Festival, in Eagle Hall, Concord, commenced Monday evening, January 7th, and closed the succeeding Friday night. Nine hundred and twenty-five membership tickets were sold to active participants from every section of the State, and musical representatives of Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Northern New York, &c.

The Church Music (selections from "The Offering"), and Glee Departments were effectively supervised by Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD of Boston, who ably conducted two concerts of miscellaneous music, Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Special attention was paid to the proper rendering of Oratorios under the skilful direction of CARL ZERRAHN. Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, of Holderness, principal Pianist, nobly sustained her reputation of being the most accomplished lady accompanist and soloist in New Hampshire. Mr. J. H. Morey, of Concord, Mr. W. W. Graves of Salisbury, and Conductor Southard, also acceptably officiated at a truly "Grand" Piano. The "Social Hour" was made a prominent feature of each day, and brought out unostentatiously a good amount of talent.

During the Convention, vocal duets were nicely rendered by Misses M. and A. E. Porter, of Manchester, N. H.; Mrs. A. C. Munroe and Mr. S. Richards of Worcester, Mass.; Songs, by Mrs. Munroe, (whose rich contralto voice easily runs three octaves), Miss M. Porter, Mr. Richards, Mr. Arrighi of the Methodist Biblical Institute, Concord, Master Harry Baker, four years old, of Concord, and others. Piano solos by Mrs. Shepard, Messrs. Morey and Graves. "Helter Skelter Galop," "Frederick's March," &c., by Concord Orchestral Club. Anthem with soprano solo by Miss Lizzie S. Odlin, of Concord. Four-hand duets by Mrs. Shepard and Mr. Morey; Mrs. S. and Mr. Graves. The Manchester Philharmonic Club, which has assiduously labored for several years, under the direction of Mr. E. T. Baldwin, to create a taste for classical productions in a not yet very musically educated community, delighted interested listeners by shading Mendelssohn's beautiful "Shepherd's Song," "Early Spring," "Presage of Spring," &c., in so artistic a manner as to not only receive the hearty plaudits of a critical audience, but also win high commendation from thoroughly educated masters of the Art.

Professional vocalists: Mrs. H. M. Smith, Soprano, Miss Addie S. Ryan, Contralto, Mr. M. W. Whitney, Basso, (all of Boston) and Mr. G. W. Hazelwood (Director of Music at the "Old Roger Williams" First Baptist Church, Providence, R. I.), Tenore,—received many flattering encores for finished songs, cavatinas, duets, &c.

Each and all appeared to great advantage at the closing Oratorio Concert, Friday night, when portions of Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were given with much taste, power and effect, splendid orchestral accompaniments being furnished by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, assisted by H. Kehrhahn, of the Boston Theatre Orchestra, Double Bass; Mr. Southard at the Cabinet Organ, and Mrs. Shepard. Hazelwood's "Comfort ye my people," and "Ye people rend your hearts"; Mrs. Smith's "There were shepherds abiding in the field"; Miss Ryan's touching "He shall feed his flock," and Mr. Whitney's "The people that walked in darkness," "It is enough," and, "Oh Lord, Thou hast overthrown Thine enemies," were rendered with genuine artistic fervor. "The Angel Trio" from "Elijah," by Mrs. Smith, Miss Abby Sanborn, of Pittsfield, N. H., and Miss Ryan, deserved its seraphic title by mellifluous sweetness. The magnificent choruses were by turns so appropriately subdued and inspiringly sublime as to satisfy the exacting critic.

Much of the improvement derived from this successful gathering of New Hampshire musicians, may justly be credited to Conductors Zerrahn and Southard, and their melodious coadjutors. The business managers, Messrs. Morey, Jackman and Davis, of Concord, were unflagging in their efforts to make the Festival pleasant as well as profitable.

Bach's Works.

(From "JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH; his Life and Writings. Adapted from the German of G. L. HILGENFELDT, with additions from other sources," as published in the London Choir.)

The knowledge of what Bach did as a performer, we are compelled to derive from history and the uniform reports of his contemporaries. But of the spiritual element of his art, and the forms in which he moulded it, we can judge ourselves from a study of his works, which are extant in sufficient number to gather from them the greatness and originality of his productive genius. In all his compositions there is no passage, no note, which does not express something, and clearly something that it was intended to say. We find no passages written merely for the sake of the rhythm, and which might be omitted. All that he does is from necessity. Starting upon the principle of unity, and always bearing this in mind, he puts down his fundamental idea so clearly, that we never lose sight of its aim. But, in the working out, the chief idea appears in so many forms of combination and contrast, that the hearer is carried to the highest reality of this intention. Each "voice" in his composition, so to say, is an independent melodious thread, which, nevertheless, freely joins itself to the firmly united texture. Thus the artistic whole is logically developed, clear and distinct in all its parts.

The early German music, chiefly that of the Church, has the character of earnestness, solemnity, and dignity. At the revival of science and art, the organ became the chief musical instrument in Germany, and remained so until the general spread of the modern Italian music. Upon the treatment of this instrument, which possesses in so high a degree the power of giving utterance to grand and noble harmonies, the whole music of that time rested. No wonder, then, that the love of harmony increased and the study of the science became general.

In Italy it was different from the beginning as regards this art. Here music had never been the exclusive property of the Church, but came first from the people. It never had that ascetic character which was impressed on it in Germany. In Germany the full-toned but rigid organ prevailed: in Italy the flexible human voice was paramount. In Germany complicated harmonious combinations were sought after and cherished: in Italy simple melodious strains carried the day. In Germany, the song formed itself after the fashion of the instrument, and was subject to it: in Italy, the instrument was subservient to the song, following it, and clinging to it. On the one side, richness and fullness of harmony; on the other, beauty and loveliness in simple continuity. Thus North and South each took their own way, until at last the splendor of harmonic combination was carried into Italy, and then, though much later, the acknowledgment of the melodious element possessed by the latter spread far and wide. It soon became so general that already, in the eighteenth century, Italy became the music-school of the whole of Europe.

The Italian style of music prevailed at an earlier period in France, and formed itself into a certain independence, which manifested itself in various ways. The German musicians studied the compositions of both countries, extracting all that was commendable from each.

Bach created a school of his own. First he studied the French, then the Italian masters. He did not condescend to imitate either, but he tried to unite the elements of both with the German style. The idea was his own, and its execution devolved upon him alone. He had to make many trials before he could carry out his views, but in all his attempts he strictly adhered to the great principle of the art—that of unity.

He recognized in this all that was perfect and beautiful. His chief artistic effort aimed at forming, from a single idea—often, at first sight, apparently an insignificant one—a complete harmonious whole; to bring this idea by melodious and rhythmical treatment so before the soul of the listener, that he could never for a moment swerve from it. Thus, then, in the compositions of Bach, the melody is never the casual result of artistically harmonious combinations. The even application of artistic elements, and the æsthetic unity produced by them, is the principal reason that even now, more than a hundred years after his death, Bach's glorious genius shines before all others on the summit of the art.

The eminent perfection of form in Bach's works is most admirable, but it is only a consequence of the inner requisites. Form and substance, however, give to his compositions the stamp of genuine works of art—namely, the representation of that which is beautiful in perfect outward form.

Bach's compositions claim the most lively interest and attention as regards the course of their æsthetic development. He who would only look to isolated effects, and judge the works of Bach by the greater or smaller number of such, should leave them untouched.

Bach's reputation as an organist and clavicinist was far spread before he ventured to bring his compositions before the notice of the public; and his first attempts, in spite of much beauty, bear the stamp of a striving yet unsatisfied mind. It is easy to see by them that the great musician had not clearly settled his system. Bach's knowledge of the science was not derived from theoretical treatises, but rather from the study of the best examples of the art. Kirnberger, Bach's pupil, has left us many interesting particulars concerning his master's "true principles of the use of harmony." Each interval was considered by him as the offspring of some fundamental tone, which may and must be used in proportion to another fundamental tone. By the recognition of this simple principle he placed himself beyond that painful musical scholasticism which had become intolerable pedantry. It must be mentioned that, towards the close of the seventeenth century, it was pretty generally agreed among musicians that the old musical system had become useless, and was no longer applicable to the improved state of the art. Almost at one and the same time a number of clear-headed men, amongst whom were Tartini, Rameau, and Mattheson, were busying themselves in the endeavor to supply something that should take the place of the old doctrines. Bach, the contemporary of these men, did not care for theoretical essays. He conceived that reform was equally necessary in the practice, and prepared to show by examples what could be effected, leaving it for others to extract from his compositions the theoretical principles upon which he had worked.

Bach's system of harmony rests chiefly on the principles of the "Fundamental Bass,"—a system, the discovery of which is erroneously attributed to Rameau. Bach had long settled his principles and given his works to the public when Rameau's Traité de l'Harmonie appeared in 1772. He clearly saw that every combination of harmony, in its application, rested on one solid foundation. It is only upon the adoption of this theory that he justified his combinations, which would be considered faulty according to the doctrines of the old masters. The peculiar treatment of dissonances, and the use of new harmonies, upon which no composer had before ventured, in this way receive full theoretical foundation. Learned theorists, "schoolmen," have even down to our own time shaken their wise heads at some of Bach's "novelties," although they could not oppose them by ear and feeling.

Perfect flow in all the parts was one of Bach's great aims, and this he always carried out irrespective of all other things, provided always that the ear was not offended. He sometimes, it is true, transgressed the ordinary rules by the use of octaves and fifths. "Everybody knows," says Forkel, "that there are cases in which they sound well, and that they must be avoided when they cause a great emptiness or nakedness of the harmony." But Bach's octaves and fifths never sounded empty or bad. However, he himself made in this point a great difference. Under certain circumstances he could not even endure covered octaves and fifths between two middle parts, which, otherwise, we at the most attempt to avoid between the two extreme parts; under other circumstances, he wrote them down so plainly, that they offended every beginner in composition, but afterwards soon justified themselves. Even in the later corrections of his earlier works, he has changed passages, which, according to the first reading, were blameless, merely for the sake of greater harmony, so that evident octaves are rarely met with in them.

It is a remarkable thing in all Bach's works, that they are strictly arranged according to the place where they were to be performed, and with regard to the means by which they were to be brought out. In his so-called "Chamber Music," he changes the endless stream of harmony quickly and continually; but in larger vocal compositions, to be performed by a considerable number of performers, he hems this rapid stream so as not to obscure the perception by redundancy. Here the harmony takes a quiet course, and yet what stupendous effects he produces by his simplicity! A similar difference exists between his clavicord and organ compositions.

Unpublished Letters of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy to Frederick Schneider at Dessau.*

I.

MOST HIGHLY RESPECTED CAPELLMEISTER, —I venture to address myself on the present occasion immediately to you, because I wish to recall to your memory that some years ago I had the honor of making your acquaintance, a circumstance you have probably forgotten. I must, however, now remind you of it, because I wish to make my request to yourself personally. You may, perhaps, have seen by the papers that I intend producing Sebastian Bach's Passionsmusik, a very fine and noble specimen of sacred music of the last century, and the performance will take place positively on Wednesday, the 11th March, in the rooms of the Singacademie. My question and request amount to this: Would you not mind the fatigue of the journey, and favor us with your company on the above-named evening, stealing a few days of your valuable time in favor of the old master, and by your presence lending additional lustre to our musical festival? Earnestly begging you to comply with my request, and anxiously hoping it may be fulfilled, I remain, with feelings of the deepest respect, your obedient servant,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

11th March, 1829.

[There is no mention made of the place whence this letter was written, but it was probably Berlin.]

* For these highly interesting letters, published by the Signale for the first time, we are indebted to the kindness of Herr Theodor Schneider, a son of Friedrich Schneider.—London Mus. World.

II.

RESPECTED FRIEND,—Receive my thanks for the above designation, which is so honorable for me, and also for your kind letter generally; it has caused me very great delight. Our friend Schubring has probably informed you at what an unhappy time it came to hand, and, in consideration of the circumstances, I trust you will excuse the lateness of my reply. I was, last week, in Berlin, whither I had been summoned by the loss of my father. It is the first severe calamity I have ever experienced, but then it is the heaviest I could possibly suffer, and I do not know whether or when I shall be able to resume and continue the labors in which I have hitherto taken a delight, or, in a word, the vocation of my life; I clearly perceive, however, that it is my duty to do so, and, consequently, I will make the attempt. I will not, therefore, delay offering you my thanks for the friendly kindness you have manifested for me in your letter, and begging you always to entertain the same feeling; I cannot say much more to-day, and feel assured that you will excuse me.—I will merely add my thanks for your sending the Symphony, towards the performance of which I look forward with great pleasure, and intend studying the work most thoroughly for the occasion. I think of giving it at one of the early concerts next year (since the two in this are already settled), and, therefore, taking advantage of your courteous offer, beg you will be kind enough to forward me the necessary parts (namely, three violins on each side, two tenors, and three double basses) some little time before Christmas. Bach's Cantatas I herewith return, and am extremely obliged to you for your kindness in sending them; I already have them, and am quite in raptures with that in E-major 12-8. His Concerto for Three Pianos was received just as (in my opinion) everything is received which is presented to people in the right way, provided it be really good. They clapped after both movements, and seemed most heartily pleased. Whether it has made any impression is a question I will not attempt to decide, but we have, at any rate, had the pleasure of hearing it, and so I should have been perfectly satisfied even though they had grumbled a little. I have quite neglected Kalliwoda, and I might now, perhaps, beg you to write me about him, since, as I am told, he has gone to Dessau, where, doubtless, you will hear him very often. The Pixia, too, I heard only once, and then not on the stage, though I propose writing shortly to you about her; to-day, I am incapable of a sensible opinion or a sensible letter. Pray excuse me! The Clergyman disappeared after that morning and has not been seen again.

Adieu, my dear Capellmeister. I wish you health and happiness; continue to entertain towards me the same sentiments of friendship you do now.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.
Leipzig, the 6th Dec. 1835.

III.

RESPECTED CAPELLMEISTER,—Not before now have I been able to return, with my best thanks, the parts you were kind enough to forward me for the Subscription Concert here. Unfortunately we had no opportunity of having also the second symphony, which you sent with that in B minor, performed this winter, and as there was no score, even I myself could not become acquainted with it; on the other hand I think you would have been contented with the performance of the Symphony in B minor, had you been present; it went with precision and animation, the audience repeatedly manifesting their approbation, especially of the Andante, which, by the way, was the part in which the orchestra was most successful. I wish I had had a couple of better hornists for the first movement; however, even they did their best, and got through without any mistakes, though, it is true, without grace; the last movement and the Scherzo, on the other hand, went almost irreproachably. Accept once more my thanks for sending the work, and for the pleasure you have thereby afforded every one.

Your new oratorio will, probably, not be heard in Leipzig for some little time, since, for the moment, there appears to be an utter want of proper feeling and zeal among the vocal dilettanti, and I think it would be a mistake to have your choruses sung by the Thomaner only, since they strike me as written expressly for female voices. It has not been possible once during the whole winter to produce any great work with choruses, and I am almost afraid that it will be no easy task to find a remedy for this unfortunate state of things.

Pray excuse, respected Capellmeister, these hurried lines, but I have been so overwhelmed with business of all sorts for the last few days, that I could hardly manage to write a letter at all; I did not, however, want to let the music go back without sending you my thanks and best compliments with it. Farewell; remember with friendship yours, truly,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

IV.

RESPECTED CAPELLMEISTER,—I hereby forward, with many thanks, the music which you had the kindness to send me, by Herr Rust, the Stiftsrath, for the Subscription Concert. It was, unfortunately, too late for me to produce one of the Symphonies; one of your earlier overtures was, however, already included in the programme, so I was enabled to substitute for it the newer one you forwarded; that such was the case, and with what interest it was received by the public and the orchestra, you have doubtless heard ere this. The execution was good nearly throughout, and we are all greatly obliged for the enjoyment you afforded us. If you had no objection to return us by the beginning of the next Series of Concerts one of the Symphonies, I can assure you that both I and all lovers of music would feel exceedingly grateful. With the highest respect I remain yours truly,

V.

Leipzig, 15 February, 1840.

RESPECTED CAPELLMEISTER,—These lines will be brought you by your son Bernhard, whose musical as well as personal acquaintance I have had very great pleasure in making. I trust and hope I shall have frequent opportunities of enjoying it. On Thursday he played successfully, and with great purity and precision, the two pieces suggested by you, which really astonished me, because, towards the end, the temperature became almost insupportable; he failed, however, in nothing, proving himself a thoroughly excellent musician who does honor to his master and his school. I hope he is not dissatisfied with the reception he met with at Leipzig.

I have now to return you my thanks for the Symphonies you so very kindly sent me. As there was fortunately still an opening in the next Subscription Concert, I immediately communicated the fact to the Directors, who had great pleasure in placing your work on the programme; your son, so he told me, wrote to you some days ago about the parts, which I hope are already on the road. I should feel obliged by your kindly informing me which of the three you would prefer having performed here; I thought of taking that in E minor, as it appears to be the last; but your son said you yourself were most partial to that in A minor, or at least that it was the one played most frequently in Dessau. As I should like to do what would be most agreeable to you, perhaps you would have the goodness, between now and then, to drop a line or two, to serve me as a guide.

I remain with the greatest respect, yours most obediently,

VI.

Leipzig, 21 February, 1840.

RESPECTED CAPELLMEISTER,—You will, I trust, receive safely in a few days the parts and scores of your three Symphonies through the firm of Herr Kistner, the music-publisher, and I must return you my best thanks for your friendly kindness in sending them. Yesterday evening we performed that in A major amid great applause, which was bestowed on it after each movement, and with redoubled animation at the conclusion. It took up the second part of the programme, and I think you would, on the whole, have been satisfied with the execution; at any rate, the orchestra played it with evident interest and attention. In the parts of the last movement there was a cut, but I took no notice of it, for I can hardly believe it was made by you; subsequent to the development of the second part, instead of returning to the theme, as it naturally should after the fermata, ought it to spring immediately to the forte, omitting the theme altogether? Was this really your intention? As I was in doubt on the subject, and as the movement did not strike me as being too long, I remained true to the score and the written parts. I had proposed to give the Symphony in E minor as the last of the three, and it was mentioned in the bills by mistake as No. 18, but I afterwards changed my mind, and am glad of it, in so far as this Symphony was so liked, and met with as lively appreciation on the part of the public as we could possibly desire. Receive once more my thanks for the pleasure you have so kindly procured us, and give all sort of remembrances to your son Bernhard from yours respectfully and obediently,

VII.

RESPECTED CAPELLMEISTER,—Ever since becoming acquainted with the facts you recently communicated to me respecting the house in which my grandfather was born at Dessau, I have been turning them over and over in my brain, and cannot repress a desire to see the memory of my grandfather perpetuated in some tangible form. I myself should prefer a simple tablet over the door, with an inscription or something of the kind.

Before puzzling myself further about it, I should wish above all things to learn to whom the house at present belongs; whether it is likely that the owner will not for the moment dispose of it to any one else; and whether he would cheerfully accept and respect such a tablet? Should it, however, be for sale, could you not quietly inform me what sort of a house it is, and what would be the price? But I can only ask this altogether on the quiet, and must, above all, beg you will excuse my troubling you with such matters, before I have really made up my mind what is to be done, or, indeed if anything at all can be done.

As it was, however, yourself who by your friendly information first started the subject, I hope you will excuse my again troubling you, and drop me a couple of lines in answer as soon as possible. By so doing you will confer a very great favor on yours most faithfully,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

VIII.

ESTEEMED CAPELLMEISTER,—Allow me, by these lines, to introduce to you M. Léonard, a very distinguished Belgian violinist, and to beg that you will give him a friendly reception. M. Léonard, formerly, and for a long time, a member of the orchestra of the Académie Royale in Paris, is one of those virtuosos who, in attaining manual dexterity and elegance, have not forgotten a sure and steady foundation. He is, in the best sense of the word, a thorough and accomplished musician, and I am, therefore, convinced that both his solo-playing, and his quartet-playing will really afford you gratification. If you can, and will, aid him in appearing either at Court, or at a concert of his own, or at one of your Subscription Concerts, you will be doing him a favor, and render me very much your debtor. I remain, as always, with the greatest consideration—Yours, most obediently,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

The Philosophy of the Fine Arts.

It may be safely affirmed, that at no period in the world's history, has there been so much musical instruction resulting in so little musical education as at the present day. By musical education we mean the cultivated ability to understand good music, to comprehend the laws of composition, to judge of their application, and discriminate the musical styles of different epochs. Musical instruction, on the other hand, may lead to nothing more than a certain finger-dexterity (playing, as it is very properly called), in which there is not the least element of culture. The former is of the soul; the latter, of the hands. Of what use to us is a knowledge of the alphabet, if we stick fast in the horn-book, and never learn to read Shakespeare or the Bible? and what benefit do we derive from our endless strumming, if we are not able to render or appreciate in the original the masterpieces of our classic composers, without having them brought down to us over the pons asinorum of a piano-adaptation? And yet how few even of our professional musicians ever get beyond this! Indeed, so rapid has been the common degeneracy in this respect during the last century, that the sublime Passionsmusik of Bach has become like a dead language to us, and to the frequenters of our concert-halls is scarcely more edifying than the Latin Salutationary of Commencement-day.

Music, like architecture, originated in the service of religion. The man who first made "barbarous dissonance" on a gong or a tom-tom had no intention of imitating any noise that he had ever heard, but was simply giving expression to his devotional feelings; it was his manner of worship. There is nothing in national melodies which shows them to have been inspired by any external agencies,—mountains, seas, deserts, rich valleys, or rocky glens. The origin of all modern sacred music is the cantus firmus and Ambrosian chant; so that in this respect, also, the Church is the oldest school of Christian art, and in our opinion there is no desecration in its continuing to perform this function. May it not be secondarily a school of art, as it is only secondarily a school of morality? Do not religious worship and art spring from the same feeling, and employ the same faculties? and are not the highest aims of each identical? If one cannot endure solecisms in a sermon, or bad grammar in a prayer, why should one be content with discord in church music or disproportion in church architecture? Worship is not necessarily more spiritual in the barn-like kirk than in the magnificent cathedral. The bronze gates of the Florentine baptistery (called by Michel Angelo "the gates of Paradise"), or the mosaic pictures of St. Peter's, are no more traps for the soul than are the rough wooden doors and white walls of the most ascetic meeting-house. Only let art be honest and genuine, and it can nowhere be more fittingly employed than in the offices of religion. Let all the arts with filial love and reverence vie with each other in beautifying and honoring the Church, their nursing mother. The oratorio, as its name implies, is essentially a prayer. But it is impossible to conceive of a grander Thanatopsis than Bach's Cantata for the Sixteenth Sunday after Trinity, the theme of which is death and immortality. The terror of the creature in view "Of the stern agony and shroud and pall,

And breathless darkness and the narrow house."

is painted by the tenor and the bass in deep dramatic colors, unsurpassed even by Gluck in the Iphigenia in Tauris. The alto sustained by a quartet of violins, raises the fearful questionings of the soul concerning a future state. Immediately the response falls from the orchestra in a cheerful ritornello, describing the saving union of the emancipated spirit with Christ the Redeemer. Finally the soprano leads the way in a recitative to a rich, angelic choral, in which we hear the exultation of a believing soul in the assurance of eternal life. There is surely nothing in such a musical representation which ought to excite suspicion in any Christian mind; yet these very masterpieces of dramatic music, which Bach, Handel, and Beethoven wrote expressly for religious worship, a so-called spirituality now banishes to the concert-hall. George Whitefield and John Wesley saw the impolicy of letting Satan have all the opera airs, although there are some which we would gladly resign to his monopoly and wish him "luck o' his prize." Even the stern John Calvin committed the music of the Reformation to Goudimel, the master of Palestrina and the greatest composer of his age. He did not think that it would contribute any the less to religious edification because it also edified artistically. We are aware that the general introduction of such music would be impracticable, owing to the difficulties attending both its execution and appreciation; it is not, however, on any plea of profanity that it should be thrust from the portals of the sanctuary. The perfection of sacred music must be sought, not so much in complicated instrumental combinations as in the simple but entrancing harmonies of the voice, the finest example of which is the pathetic Gregorian Chant of Holy Week in the Sistine Chapel at Rome. As a means of expression, vocal music stands higher than instrumental, and marks the transition from music to poetry, the blending of which constitutes song. Contrary to the common theory, we are inclined to regard instrumental music as the earlier and more primitive form. It is certainly that which prevails among savage tribes; and Jubal, the first musician mentioned in the Hebrew writings, is not spoken of as a singer, but as "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." Between music and poetry there is a close affinity; each admitting of the same classification into epic, lyric and dramatic. The Greek poets were all musicians, and the Germans call a composer Tondichter, i.e. a poet of tones. Gluck, the great musical dramatist, says, that in composing the Alceste, he repeated the text until he had completely entered into the spirit of it, when the music came of itself. The perfect understanding of the words developed the melody in them, as the eye of the painter sees the fresco in the cartoon before it has been pricked to the wall.*

Poetry, both in form and content, is a richer, more spiritual, and more comprehensive art than music. It is art articulate,—art with its tongue loosed. Its material is not mere sound, but speech—sound embodied in word; its domain is coextensive with the realm of the imagination. The specific difference between the tone which is sung and the word which is spoken consists in this, that the former is the spontaneous outgushing of the feeling soul, whereas the latter is the conscious product of the thinking mind. The substantial tone and the articulate word stand to each other in the relation of sentiment to thought, of the passive soul to the active intellect. Originally every word is a musical note, i. e. the idea is expressed entirely by the sound; but language soon frees itself from this limitation, and the word becomes a mere sign for the thought or thing,—the sound is no longer essential to it. The word man conveys to the mind a certain idea or image; but this idea or image is not exclusively associated with the sound produced by uttering that word, but can be denoted by other sounds,—ἄνθρωπος, homo, Mensch, l'homme, &c. The articulate word, although originally the tone-image of an object, loses, in the perfected language, this characteristic, and becomes the mere sign of the object. In music, on the contrary, the sentiment cannot be separated from the sound; the latter cannot be changed without changing the former. An ode of Horace or a sonnet of Milton may be translated into another tongue, or resolved into rhythmic prose, yet the meaning is not lost, and it still remains a work of art; but an attempt to disturb, in like manner, a sonata of Mozart, or one of Beethoven's symphonies, would transform all their harmonies into a farrago of crotchets, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Music awakens thought by means of emotion; poetry excites emotion by means of thought; consequently the effects of the former are more immediate and intense, those of the latter more indwelling and enduring. A musical composition is a series of evanescent pictures or dissolving views, each of which is "a moment bright, then gone forever"; nothing remains of the beautiful creation but the coarse machinery that moved it,—dead notes and dumb instruments. Poetry is less dependent on material conditions, and speaks at once to the heart and the intellect without the agency of wood, wire, or catgut. The earliest poetry was connected with music in the religious chant, and bore a priestly stamp. Such were the productions of the Grecian bards Olen and Orpheus, the hymns of the Indian Veda and Persian Avesta, the Hebrew Psalms, the old Salian chants, and the Scandinavian Eddas. Next came the age of heroes and hero-worship, and the development of epic verse. With the progress of civilization and political freedom, and the intergrowth of social and domestic life, lyric poetry sprang up, and last of all the drama.† Thus out of the amorphous material of rude hieratic songs arose the three generic forms of poetry; as in the hollow tree we find the germ of the classic temple, and in the rough, Arcadian stone trace the origin of the beautiful Phidian statue.

* "Ich glaube," says Gluck in the Zuweisung of his Alceste, "die Musik müsse für die Poesie das sein, was die Lebhaftigkeit der Farben und eine glückliche Mischung von Schatt und Licht für eine fehlerfreie und wohlgeordnete Zeichnung sind, welche nur dazu dienen, die Figuren zu beleben, ohne die Umrisse zu zerstören."

† This classification is made by Aristodemus in Xenophon's Memorabilia, I. 4. 3; by Plato in the Republic, II. 97; and also by Aristotle in the Poetica, 8. 2.

To the perfection of the drama each of the lower arts contributes its highest result; the symmetry of architecture, the gracefulness of plastic beauty, the vividness of color, and the sweet soul of melody, combined and enlivened by action, blend in harmonious whole. Painting is no longer mute and motionless;

"Verse ceases to be airy thought,
And sculpture to be dumb."

Only a few nations, comparatively, have reached the height of dramatic poetry. The Hebrews never rose above the lyric, and the Scandinavians attained only a crude epic. Greek poetry was the first that passed through a complete cycle of development, reaching its zenith in the tragedies of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. English poetry culminated during the sixteenth century in Shakespeare; French, during the seventeenth, in Corneille, Racine, and Molière; German, during the eighteenth, in Goethe and Schiller. In Æschylus we find frequent traces of epic and lyric elements which disappear in Sophocles and Euripides; and this is true also of the older English dramatists, as compared with the "Swan of Avon." Likewise in mediæval literature we observe the same chronological order. First, the priestly poetry of which Muspilli, Krist, and Heliand are specimens; secondly, the epopee or heroic poem represented by the Nibelungen and Kudrun; then the lyric of Troubadours and Minnesingers; and lastly, sacred and profane drama in the Mysteries and Miracle-plays. As song forms the transition from music to poetry, so the drama is the connecting link between poetry and prose. In it rhyme ceases to be an ornament, and becomes an excrescence and a hindrance; and the only species of verse at all suitable to it is the Iambic measure, which approximates very closely to prose. Indeed, modern dramatic poetry shows a constantly increasing tendency to rid itself of all metrical restraints and employ the freer vehicle of artistic prose. A versified tragedy degenerates almost inevitably into declamation and rhetoric, a fate from which even the genius of Schiller has failed to save it.

The youngest and most spiritual of the arts is prose. Its instrument is speech, like that of poetry; but it is speech emancipated from the limitations of metre, alliteration, and rhyme,—speech set free, oratio soluta; consequently it has fewer technical difficulties to overcome, and expresses itself more clearly and directly. The Muse of poesy is not the less fettered, because with truly feminine taste and tact she makes an ornament of her thralldom, and weaves her chains into garlands. Besides, the source of prose is not the imagination alone, nor any other isolated faculty; it is an outflow of the whole mind, and its domain is coextensive with the combined powers of the soul. It is as much above poetry as character is superior to faculty, or a full symmetrical man to a single fine feature. With a less complex mechanism it can do more, and is an organ of higher revelation. The essential nature of poetry is plastic; the spirit of prose is picturesqueness. The former is allied to sculpture, as the latter is to painting, or as music is to architecture. The higher and more spiritual an art is, and the finer the material which it employs, the more intimately it is connected with the personality of the artist. The architect projects the plan; others erect the building. The sculptor moulds the clay in the form of the statue, and is thus brought into closer relations to his creation; but it is the stone-cutter who puts it in marble, and the founder who pours it in bronze. The painter, however, not only sketches the cartoon, but with his own hand limns the picture. So in music, the lowest of the speaking arts, the composer who creates the work commits it to the musician for execution, and it has no real existence until the latter embodies it in sound; and it seems to us that prose, as compared with poetry, bears the seal of the author's individuality more clearly impressed upon it, inasmuch as the poet is obliged to fit his conception to a Procrustean form which he has only a very limited power to modify; his thought is forced into an artificial channel, whilst that of the prose-writer flows with the wider freedom of a river wearing its own bed and heaping up its own shores. In poetry, too, there is a lingering vestige of music; its full effect depends as much on the tone, color, weight, and temperature of the words and letters, as on their meaning. The versification of Coleridge's Christabel, or of Milton's Allegro and Penseroso, is inseparable from the very sentiment of those poems; and Shakespeare's Tempest is a symphony with passages as beautifully modulated as any in Beethoven; indeed, the whole play, like Caliban's enchanted island, is "full of noises, Sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight, and hurt not."

In prose these purely sensuous qualities of language are less prominent; the word is valued more for its signification, and not so much for its sound. Chronologically, also, prose is a later development than poetry, and presupposes a greater maturity of the general mind. From the epos sprang romance and history; from the lyric, theology and philosophy; and from the drama, oratory. Thus in Grecian literature we can trace this continuity of growth, and find that Homer and Thucydides, Pindar and Plato, Sophocles and Demosthenes, are connected by a link as logical as that which binds conclusion to premise in the clamps of a syllogism. It is only a progress from individualization to generalization; from the concrete to the abstract, corresponding to the growth of the intellect in men and nations.*

As the most romantic landscapes lie where craggy mountains and fertile lowlands meet, so the most poetical periods in history are where a rude and dark age just begins to brighten with the soft tints of a dawning civilization; but with the increasing light of culture is ushered in the era of prose, which, like an invading monarch, first takes possession of the valleys and the plains as a legitimate domain, and then pushes his conquests into the highlands, whose native queen, Poesia, retires farther and farther into her constantly diminishing realm, until at length nothing remains obedient to her sceptre but the solitude of a Parnassian peak. In literature, the ascendancy of prose is always in direct ratio to the general advance of the human spirit, and the clearing up of the intelligence. As a vehicle for the movement of ideas, it is far more adequate than poetry, and is therefore a better exponent of modern civilization. Substantially, the barriers between these two arts are already broken down, so that the terms poetry and prose no longer represent distinct circles of thought and emotion; they also become assimilated in form and grammar in proportion as the sensuous life of language dies out, and the spiritual qualities predominate. Thus, one of the most marked peculiarities of modern language is what might be called their prose organization; i. e. their prosody or metrical system is founded, not on quantity, but on accentuation, so that by this change the chief distinction between oratio vincta and oratio soluta, as understood by the ancients, is lost; and we may confidently look forward to the time when the fusion of these forms shall be rendered more complete, by the abolition of that "bondage of rhyming," which Milton condemns as "the invention of a barbarous age," and which Ben Jonson characterizes as "wresting words from their true calling." There is no good reason why the relative duration of successive syllables in time should have been insisted upon as essential to poetry; for we might with equal propriety follow the example of Simmius of Rhodes, and establish a canon that the lines should be of such length, and so arranged, that the finished poem would present to the eye the form of a heart, a battle-axe, an egg, a flute, or a phoenix. But the constant tendency in human speech is to shake off these conventional shackles, in proportion as it frees itself from the dominion of the senses, and becomes an organ of revelation for the higher reflective faculties. The spiritualizing and enfranchising influence of Christianity transformed Greek into an accentuated language; and Grimm has shown that the same process took place also in German, which originally made quantity or the temporal value of the vowels the basis of its prosodial system.

Did our space permit, it would be easy to cite passages from standard authors in illustration of what has been alleged as to the pre-eminence of prose, its wider range and superior capabilities as a form of literary art. If her younger muse, like a Cinderella, is generally made to perform all the drudgeries of life and leave the finer fancy-work to her poetic sister, she sometimes throws aside the kirtle and the clog, and appears at the king's feast in rich robes and silver slippers. It is in some of his most splendid and pathetic passages that Shakespeare unclasps the golden cincture of verse, and revels in the fuller freedom of imaginative and impassioned prose; and there are many portions of Milton's Areopagitica which rival in grandeur the best books of the Paradise Lost. The reader, however, must remember that the prose to which we have awarded the highest place among the fine arts is not that which M. Jourdain had been speaking more than forty years without knowing it. Tout ce qui n'est point prose est vers, et tout ce qui n'est point vers est prose, is a definition well suited to the limited faculties of the Bourgeois Gentilhomme; but for the purposes of philosophical discussion we prefer the nicer distinction made by De Quincey between "literature (litera humaniores)" and anti-literature (litera didactica.)" To literature thus defined belong poetry and prose, including, not the sum total of things printed, but only those books which seek to communicate power, and the purpose of which is not to convey information to the intelligence in a pedagogical sense, but to inform the soul in an artistic or creative sense. To anti-literature belong works of science which seek to impart knowledge, grammars, dictionaries, cyclopedias, chronicles, most histories and books of travel, and, in general, all productions of the press wherein the matter to be communicated is paramount to the manner of its communication.* This immense mass of useful knowledge is wholly excluded from prose considered as a fine art, and consequently can claim no place in literature proper, to which it bears the same relation that the color-bag does to the painting, or the quarry to the cathedral. Art is the service of the ideal; and the more refined and intellectual this service becomes, the more spiritual is the medium which it employs for its manifestation. "Beauty," says Michel Angelo, "is the purgation of superfluities;" and it is by this law that the progress of art may be computed. Temple, statue, picture, oratorio, and book are not repetitions of the soul, but each in its turn gives a fuller and finer measure of it. They are related to one another like the substances in the chemical tables, where every positive becomes negative by having a new substance placed above it. At present, this highest positive point is occupied by literature. The artists of to-day are the men of letters. But literature itself is only the surrogate of life. Deeds of goodness and courage are a higher incarnation of the beautiful than words, however wise and eloquent. Campbell says of Sir Philip Sidney, that his life was "poetry put into action." All the nobilities of his nature were enshrined in that form. Everything that man can do may be divinely done. The great soul converts the lowliest duty into a sublime work.

* Quintilian calls history carmen solutum, in distinction from poesis alligata ad certum pedum necessitatem (Inst. X.1); and Schelling characterizes it as das ewige Gedicht des göttlichen Verstandes (Ueber das Academische Studium, p. 219). Plato in his divine Dialogues repeatedly speaks of the poets as not only sons and prophets of the gods, but also as fathers and guardians of wisdom. Plutarch, in his "Morals," defines poetry to be a primitive philosophy (πρώτην τὴν ἀφ' ὧν σοφίαν), or rather a storehouse of pre-philosophical material (ἐν ποίημασι προφίλοσοφόντων); and according to the acute and critical Montaigne, philosophie est une poésie sophistiquée.

"A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room as for thy laws
Makes that and the action fine."

The poet gleams from the barren field a rich harvest which the husbandman knew not of. Beauty will come to every condition of life, when men once learn to lift themselves above selfish aims, and serve the ideal in whatever they do,—when all the machinery of our civilization, like the wheels in Ezekiel's vision, shall move in obedience to divine impulses, as the supplements of man's spiritual nature, and the ship, the railroad, and the telegraph be transformed from the mercenary agents of trade into the shining vehicles of truth and liberty and universal brotherhood.

* "Poetry is not the proper antithesis to prose, but to science. Poetry is opposed to science, and prose to metre. The proper and immediate object of science is the acquirement or communication of truth; the proper and immediate object of poetry is the communication of pleasure." In this quotation from Coleridge, substitute power for pleasure, and the definition becomes essentially the same as that which we have given.

"Royalties" and "Claribel."

(From the London Orchestra, Jan. 12.)

It would be a curious though a humiliating study to speculate to what extent the future historian of art in Great Britain, in treating of the artistic status of 1866, will ascribe the decline of song music to the influence of the Royalty system. That this system has exercised a deleterious influence on musical literature, admits of no doubt. In estimating the corroding effect exerted by materialism on art, the preponderance of that materialistic element, commercial speculation, cannot be too strongly taken into account. That selfish, circumscribed, one-idea'd, and subversive noun substantive only fully expressed in English of all European tongues, and by us called Business, is at once the encourager and the destroyer of art. It exercises its fostering influence when regulated by judgment and taste: it subverts when all its leading principle is implied in the idea of gain. For gain, pure and simple, includes—in art matters at least—an engrossing care of the simply remunerative elements at the expense of the true; and with this is bound up a seeking after whatever is popular and therefore profitable, without regard to the enquiry whether it is veracious, or pure, or what would be the effect on the arts generally, if this spirit obtained elsewhere as it does in music. In painting we should have our sole results in the representation of those vulgar details which interest the common crowd: the picture of a street-fight would command readier sale than the poetry of a Turner; a Correggio would cede in interest to the limner of a shobeen. In sculpture the debased would prevail, and command the general support of the ill-informed majority. In literature poetry would soon cease to exist, as possessing no charms for the illiterate million, and as affording a less remunerative speculation than the sensational and emotional fiction. But it is chiefly into music that the commercial spirit so strongly enters; and this spirit threatens to engross all other and higher considerations.

We have persistently—in common with a contemporary whose earnestness and disinterestedness on musical topics even those who disagree with some of his principles dare not question—denounced the system of Royalties on songs, as one utterly subversive of true art. We care not to enter on the abstract question whether a singer does not deserve a share of the profits of a song which he or she helps materially to popularize; and we would even admit the right of such perquisites if we saw that these had produced beneficial results—beneficial, that is to say to art—in any prominent instance. But what are the true results of the Royalty system? That we are deluged with a flood of inferior productions—music so poor that no epithet can sufficiently stigmatize it, and in each instance leading to such a direct pecuniary profit to the singer that such a state of things is fostered by the individual who sees a considerable income assured by the debasement of the true in art. By such means charlatanism acquires a popular triumph, while the works of the true artist and conscientious musician are neglected.

A glance at the productions we have alluded to is sufficient argument against them. Had we space, we could fill our pages with instances of the injurious music—always feeble, often destructive—which characterizes them. But why harrow our readers' eyes, as their ears have been harrowed at unending concerts? The literature of the things is on a par with their music; for Claribel writes "poetry" too, and in this fashion:—

And so I am going to be married,
This brightest, merriest day!
They are gathering now for the bridal:
O what will the neighbors say?

Or take the following piece of feminine "archness," to which the Royalty signature of C. A. B. is attached—not by many the first instance of a hack Pegasus yoked to a C. A. B.—

On Sunday after church, Robin,
I looked around for you.
I thought you'd see me home, Robin,
As once you used to do.
But now you seem afraid to come;
And almost every day
I meet you in the meadows,
You look the other way.

The music of the above, wholly worthy of the words, owes like them its inspiration to Claribel. The interesting production, in common with most of the same ware, is published by a respectable music-firm in Holles-street.

"Milly's faith" is no renegade to the same order. Milly's lover Mark is gone for a soldier—"o'er the salt sea-foam," presumably being a marine. Milly thus bewails him:—

Oh would those drums had never come near!
For Mark was happy and peaceful here,
Content to follow his father's plough.
Oh I wish in my heart he was after it now.

We wish he were! It would save him the despicable fate of being the hero of a Royalty ballad. We may be permitted to differ politely from a wish expressed by this same author and lyricist in a popular song to which Mme. Sainton-Dolby lends ignoble aid. In the composition quoted the poet remarks:

I cannot sing the old songs,
For visions come again
Of golden dreams departed,
And years of weary pain.
Perhaps when earthly fetters
Shall set my spirit free
My voice may know the old songs
For all eternity.

Heaven forfend! For the future state, in which Claribel's old songs constitute the music of the spheres, must be, not to put too fine a point on it, Ilades; and we are far from wishing so much ill to any suffering spirit as to join in the sentiment which dooms it to hear Claribel-ware eternally.

The immediate pointing of our moral is the concert announced by Mme. Sainton-Dolby for next Wednesday—another of those affairs, euphuistically termed Ballad Concerts, which are from time to time got up by this artist for the purpose of foisting more musical bric-a-brac on the public. Additional royalties are to be introduced at this gathering; additional sixpences on the sale of these will drop into the singer's pocket; additional injury be done the cause of music. It must not be understood from our reiterated objections to these speculations that we deprecate ballad concerts in the legitimate sense of the word. On the contrary. Our English audiences enjoy ballads: it is a part of the national character to love this class of music; nor would we see the feeling altered. So strong is the public fondness for ballad music that the mere name will attract a good audience in the hope of getting what they love and want—a good old English ballad—even where the word of promise is kept to the ear and broken to the hope. With most of us there is always some old and tender association bound up with the hearing of a ballad, some memory of childhood, some face of the friend that sang it years and years ago before absence or death had silenced the tender voice; so that the music is woven into the history of our lives, and the hearing of it is like the opening of a forgotten page. But are the trivialities of the needy speculators of today worthy the immemorial name of Ballad? When Mr. Ransford, or any honest musician of his stamp, announces a ballad concert, we know what it means: when Mme. Sainton-Dolby does the same we know what that means—and that is, Royalties. It is at once reprehensible and piteous that an artist who has gone through Mme. Sainton's career, with such a worthy retrospect, should come to this. We know that the sunset of fame brings out strange characteristics: we have heard of great generals, crowned with laurels, descending when old to speculate in army-clothing, and laying aside the sword for the shears. Mme. Sainton is doing her best—or worst—to reconcile us with the decay of her powers, and to lessen the regret we shall feel when she takes her leave of the platform. But while she remains on it she should conserve some respect for her past. A true artist is no huckster. Were it not for their professional self-respect, our concert-singers might all fly to the music-hall as more remunerative; and we commend this issue to Mme. Sainton-Dolby's notice as the direction in which her present policy would tend, if she followed it out to its natural conclusions.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN. Herr Stockhausen, the famous baritone singer, gave lately a concert in the Singakademie, assisted by instrumental artists, who played Beethoven's Trio in D, a Quintet by Scholz, and some solos. "Stockhausen himself (so writes Gumprecht in the Nationalzeitung) "greeted his audience with Schumann's Löwenbraut (Chamisso's ballad). It was a model of delivery in the thorough interpenetration of word and tone, as well as in the fine characteristic shadings and transitions. Richest variety in detail and pervading unity of style went hand in hand. The latter element, we thought, preponderated in the purely lyrical songs which followed, Lenau's Schilflied and Heine's Herbstlied by Mendelssohn, and three of the Scotch songs arranged by Beethoven with trio accompaniment, against which a soprano voice would have stood out better than a baritone."

On the same evening, the pianist Tausig began a cyclos of very private (privatissimen) soirées in Arnim's hall. Several such cycles are to occur. One is devoted to so-called "Chopin evenings;" another to "Beethoven evenings." The first one was opened by Music-director Weitzmann, with a lecture on the life and works of Chopin; after which Herr Tausig played the Allegro de Concert, the Polonaise with the Andante spianato, some Mazourkas and the last Etudes of Op. 10, with a really demoniacal fire and incomparable technique.

Tausig is thus spoken of in an article from the Nieder-Rheinische Musikzeitung:

Karl Tausig, who, some twelve years since, was, as a youth in Weimar, on account of his eminent natural taste for music, especially pianoforte-playing, distinguished by Liszt above all the other students who came to him for instruction, has brilliantly confirmed the prophecies of the master concerning his pupil's future greatness. His playing at the Soirée on Tuesday last, notwithstanding the great reputation which preceded him, and which—to speak frankly—from the manner in which it was heralded in certain papers, renders us suspicious rather than confident, certainly surpassed our expectations, high as those were. The audience, not a very numerous one, by the way, as the concert happened to fall on the same evening as the performance of our artistic visitors, Herr and Mme. Jauner, at the Opera, was perfectly overpowered by the amazing feats accomplished by the performer, for the manner in which they are executed is something absolutely fabulous. We are very well aware that it is the proper thing for classical dilettantism to shrug up its shoulders in a noticeable manner when speaking of such a virtuoso, and especially of his "technical" skill, or executive powers; but the unenvious musician will laugh compassionately at this same shrugging of the shoulders, because he knows that, without inborn genius, perfection of execution is an impossibility. In music there are three kinds of genius: the genius of invention; the genius of thematic and contrapuntal work; and the genius of virtuosity. The three are never, or rarely, combined, if we take the word "genius" in its true acceptation; in this, as in everything else, Mozart forms an exception. Let us, therefore, accord to each of these three gifts, wherever nature has bestowed it, the laurels due to it; Liszt and Paganini, for instance, will consequently, in our estimation, always occupy the highest possible place, as men possessing unrivalled executive genius. We say "unrivalled," and this we will maintain in regard to Liszt, Bülow, and Tausig notwithstanding. Tausig performs things on the piano which certainly we never heard performed in such perfection, and, we should almost say, with such profound effect even by Liszt himself. But to that magic and spiritual, though, it is true, unnameable something, which, both in Liszt's melodic and bravura style, went to the soul of his hearer, whom it threw in a peculiar and elevated frame of mind, we have found nothing analogous either in Bülow or Tausig, despite their undeniable genius as virtuosos. Tausig strikes us, by-the-by, as master, in a high degree, of the gentler kind of expression, as was proved by his mode of giving a "Notturmo" by Field, and a "Caprice-Walzer," with which we were unacquainted, by Schubert—a pretty, but curious composition, in which the left hand keeps on the Ländler step in continuous three-four time, while the right indulges in graceful and changing play among the flowers and leaves, set in motion by the wind as it rustles through them. The flowery perfume of this piece was admirably rendered by a gentleness of touch, and a transparent correctness of the figures which appear breathed not played. But a genuine specimen of the non plus ultra of mastership was exhibited by him in Liszt's "Tarantella" on the choral motive from the Muette de Portici, and in Chopin's mighty "Polonaise" in A flat (Op. 53). Liszt once said that in Chopin's "Polonaises" the rattle of the Polish sabres and spurs ought to be heard, and we can affirm that Herr Tausig causes the earth to groan under the hoofs of an Uhlan regiment, in the continuous and fearful bass crescendo which he raises not merely from piano to forte, but from forte to fortissimo, and then to a fulness of sound such as was never previously heard upon a piano, and never thought possible. Such elasticity of touch, steadily increasing in strength in a quick tempo so long kept up, is something that really borders upon the Incomprehensible.

An operetta has been successfully brought out at the Friedrich Wilhelmstädtsche Theater Berlin, called "Franz Schubert." The composer—or, rather, arranger—has dived into Schubert's melodic riches, and brought many gems to the surface, which make up a happy pastiche.

LEIPZIG. The Orchestra's correspondent (Dec. 28) pronounces the "Frithjof" of Max Bruch, lately performed at the Gewandhaus, a masterpiece:

Not only does the coloring through the whole score stand in harmonical unity with the subject, but its details are so true that every melodic phrase, every chord and every instrumental effect are as true and impressive as the whole itself. The best proof of my assertion is, that not only on the first performance, through all Germany, was the success of Frithjof great, but after the second and third reproductions of it, like here in Leipzig, it has mounted in favor.

Undoubtedly the best execution of the work I have heard was this last one at the Gewandhaus Concert, on the 20th inst. The choruses were capably sung by the intelligent young students of Leipzig (the Pauliner Gesangverein), under the clever leadership of Dr. Langer, a spirited musician, who always sings at the head of his pupils. The beautiful part of Frithjof was entrusted to Signor Marchesi, who, according to the general opinion here, threw a new dramatic life into it, bringing out many beauties. The part of Ingeborg was not in good hands, the Fräulein Scheuerlein, pupil of the Conservatoire of Leipzig, being a mere beginner, and wanting a few more years' learning to become an artist. However, as she possesses a fine voice, is really gifted, and has studied the part very accurately, she produced some effect and was deservedly applauded. I hear with pleasure that Fräulein Scheuerlein has left to-day for Cologne, to learn singing at the Conservatorium there. No doubt under a good teacher this young lady will become a first-rate singer. It is quite unnecessary to speak of the excellence of the execution on the part of the orchestra of the Gewandhaus on the occasion. The violino obbligato to the delicious quartet, "Sonne so schön" (4th scene), was wonderfully played by Concertmeister David, and the small but important tenor part in the same quartet was very finely sung by Herr Wiedemann from Leipzig. The harpist was a young artist, Herr E. Liebig from Berlin. It was a magnificent ensemble, and the public as well as the local newspapers are unanimous in declaring this last performance of "Frithjof" the best of the three which have already taken place in Leipzig.

As the "Frithjof" filled only the second part of the programme, we had in the first part an overture by J. W. Kalliwoda (died on the 3rd inst.), first time of performance in Leipzig, composed in 1857, "zur 50jährigen Jubelfeier des Prager Conservatoriums." This work, technically well composed, is exceedingly pleasing, though wanting in melodic originality. As to its style, it answers exactly to the purpose of a commemorative feast; and the end of it, introducing the Austrian national hymn, is really imposing. A Fräulein Ch. Dekner from Pesth, a violinist, played the Concerto of Mendelssohn first, and afterwards a Sarabande and a Loure of J. S. Bach. This talented young lady is undoubtedly a very fine player in a technical point of view, but she will never reach the highest sphere of art, lacking as she does its first element, sentiment. Her best achievement was the Sarabande of Father Bach, and she was unanimously recalled.

Abert's "Astorga" continues its successful career through Germany. It has now been given at Stuttgart, Leipzig, Karlsruhe, Prague, Schwerin, and Baden—and everywhere has met with enthusiasm. Beyond the frontiers, it is going to France; for M. Carvalho, according to Figaro, intends having it translated into French for performance next winter.

MUNICH. The General Intendant of the theatre announce that it is their intention to fill up the intervals between acts with stringed quartets, and they have charged several composers to write pieces with that object.

BASLE. At the third Trio Soirée of Herren Hans von Bülow, Abel, and Kahnt, among the pieces performed were Beethoven's Sonata, op. 102, No. 1; Raff's Trio, op. 112; and Kiel's E flat major Trio, op. 24.

FRANKFORT. At the third Museum Concert the band performed C-major Symphony, Haydn; Entr'acte to "Rosamunde," Franz Schubert; and Overture to "Abu Hassan," Cherubini. Mme. Clara Schumann played Schumann's A-minor Concerto, together with some smaller pianoforte pieces, and Herr Hill sang some songs by Schubert and Schumann.

COBLENTZ. At the first Subscription Concert, under the direction of Herr Max Bruch, the works selected for performance were, C-minor Symphony, Beethoven; "Jubelouverture," Weber; and "Frühlingsbotschaft," Gade. Herr de Swert, also, played a Concerto by Molique.

WIESBADEN. The Intendant of the Theatre Royal has announced six Subscription Concerts, at which, in contradistinction to the displays of frivolous virtuosity forming the staple attraction at the concerts got up by the directors of the Kurhaus, classical works alone will constitute the programme. Herr Jahn has been selected as conductor, and the following works will be played at the first concert:—Part First: "Passacaglia," J. S. Bach (scored by H. Esser); Recitative and Aria from "Rinaldo," Handel (scored by Meyerbeer); Overture to "Ali Baba," Cherubini; Serenade for five female voices, F. Schubert; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," R. Wagner. Part Second: Sinfonie in G major (6), J. Haydn.

COPENHAGEN. The Musical Union of which Professor Niels W. Gade is the director, give every season—from October till April—three grand concerts, and seven minor ones. The distinction lies in the fact that the first-named are given in the large room of the Casino, which holds between twelve and thirteen hundred persons, and the others in the smaller room, where only five or six hundred persons can be acommodated. The directors publish at the beginning of each season a prospectus, naming the principal compositions which they intend to bring before the public at the minor concerts. Three of these compositions are devoted to chamber music, and the other four are scored for orchestra. From the last published prospectus we learn that Joachim has accepted an engagement, and that the programmes of chamber-music concerts have not yet been decided upon. The following works will be performed:—Beethoven's Sinfonia No. 9; "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt;" "Oh, perfido spergiuro;" and the Concerto for Piano, No. 4.—W. S. Bennett's Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in F minor; Cherubini's overture to "Funiska;" Haydn: Sinfonia and "La Tempesta;" Mendelssohn: selection from "Elijah," and Hymn for soprano, chorus and orchestra, in G major; Mozart: Sinfonia; Vesper Song for chorus and orchestra, and Recitative and Aria for soprano, with piano and orchestra obbligato; R. Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," and "The Paradise and the Peri." By Danish composers the following will be performed:—Professor J. P. E. Hartmann's Overture to Oehlenschläger's tragedy "Correggio;" Emil Hartmann's "Havfruen" (the Mermaid), for tenor, chorus and orchestra; P. Heise's Sinfonia in G minor.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 28. The most interesting musical events of the present season have been the two, of the series of three, Symphony Concerts of Messrs. Jarvis and Schmitz, given at the Musical Fund. They deserve especial mention, as being the initiatory steps to the regular establishment of entertainments of this character. It has been quite a disgrace to so large a city as Philadelphia, that with all the partiality that is here professed and manifested for the best of music—the different classical soirées of Messrs. Wolfsohn, Jarvis, Gaertner, Cross, and others, being invariably well attended,—that orchestral concerts have been so rare. These gentlemen, Messrs. J. and S., two of our leading musicians, possessing great ability and the necessary zeal in behalf of art, have determined that the reproach shall remain no longer; and they, no less than the music-loving public, are to be congratulated upon the success that has resulted from their determination. Mr. Jarvis is well known throughout the country as occupying a prominent position in the ranks of American pianists. Mr. Schmitz is the talented young director of the Germania Orchestra, and a violoncellist of great excellence.

The first concert was given last month, when the 7th Symphony of Beethoven was produced, Mr. Schmitz leading, with a very full orchestra of nearly 60 of our best resident artists. This glorious work, often called the Students' Symphony, from its peculiarly jubilant character, was very satisfactorily interpreted. The magnificently instrumented "Carneval Romain" Overture of Berlioz was the introductory item of the programme.

At the second concert, on Saturday evening last, the Jupiter Symphony was the great attraction. The orchestra was even larger than at the first concert. To be brief, Mr. Schmitz won new laurels as a Conductor. By his success in directing these performances he has triumphantly overcome no little prejudice existing against him, on account of his youth and inexperience.

At the last Concert, also, Camilla Urso was present, and performed the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and the Fantasia Caprice of Wieniawski. Your readers are familiar with the merits of this artiste, and there is no need of my enlarging thereupon.

Mr. Jarvis' Piano performances at these entertainments have been of his best, including Weber's Concertstück, the 2d Concerto of Chopin, and other morceaux.

The next concert will be given in about a fortnight, when the 1st Symphony of Schumann will be given.

The attendance on each occasion has been gratifyingly large. MERCUTIO.

Concerts.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT (Friday Afternoon, Jan. 18) was a brilliant case of Art triumphant over weather,—over the worst obstacles in fact that winter can heap up. For though that day was bright, the great snow storm of the day and night before had laid an embargo on all travelling, and one almost feared that the primitive wild elements had risen in rebellion to bury up our old rotten civilization and make society impossible. But such weather crises always brings with them a certain inspiration and make things lively; what we do enjoy, we do it with a keener zest than usual, if we take the pains to have it, at such times. The suburban subscribers were unfortunately cut off from a fine concert; but in the city, though drive-ways were obliterated in most streets, there was good walking through narrow paths, mid high and sparkling white embankments, through an uncommonly clean world. So the Music Hall showed an unexpectedly large audience, with a majority of ladies, and just the most attentive and appreciative class of listeners. Fuss and fashion never know these good times.

The hour of the concert had arrived, but not yet Mme. CAMILLA URSO, who was to play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. She had left New York by the train on Thursday morning, and at the concert hour on Friday had reached a snow-bank on the outskirts of the city, whence, after waiting two hours, cold and half-starved, she walked into town, too late and of course in no condition to appear. She had done her best in bravely persevering in the desperate attempt.

Fortunately the same storm kept the Bateman concert troupe in town, and by favor of Mr. Bateman, who allowed his own disadvantage to work to our advantage, Mr. CARL ROSA very kindly consented, at such short notice and with scarcely any preparation, to play the Concerto in case Mme. Urso should not arrive by the time the Symphony was over. This was an awkward and trying situation for him, but the announcement was most welcome to the audience; for did not the very mention of Rosa and the coupling of his name with that Concerto recall delightful memories of the very first Symphony Concert, when his playing of that piece and the Chaconne of Bach lent such lustre to the beginning, and made the whole enterprise seem doubly sure?

This time, nervous as he was up to that moment, he seemed inspired as soon as he put his bow upon the strings; and, if carrying the music home to every hearer, if holding an audience spell-bound with delight for half an hour be any true criterion, he played even better than before. We know not what slight technical defects in detail there may have been—some forcing of the tone, perhaps, at times—but it was beautiful, it was music, it was divine. Manly strength and almost feminine delicacy, bold enthusiasm and well-tempered, even unity and consistency alike characterized it. The Mendelssohn Concerto was thoroughly enjoyed, and the young artist's praise was soon in every mouth; indeed we have come to think of him as ours, as vitally part and parcel of the Symphony Concerts.—After the last Overture, Rosa played, with piano accompaniment by Mr. DRESEL, the "Souvenirs de Haydn," by Léonard, that very effective fantasia on "God save the Emperor," which he has often given in the Bateman concerts, bringing out the full chords with rich, searching tone and sure mastery.

This was not the only providential escape of that concert. About a dozen members of the orchestra were snowed up in returning from engagements in neighboring States; but, thanks to the presence of the Italian Opera in the city, there was the full complement of instruments, and the Symphony, Schumann's in D minor, the fourth and last, went very finely and was greatly and (we believe we may safely say) generally relished. It had been played in Boston only once before, and that was ten years ago in one of Mr. ZERRAHN's "Philharmonic Concerts" then held in the old Melodeon.

The Symphony in D minor was principally written in 1841, immediately after the first, in B flat; but was worked over anew in 1851 and published as No. 4, Op. 120. It was first produced at the Dusseldorf festival in 1853. The more we hear it the more we are inclined to think it the best of all the four. Schumann had by this time become master of the polyphonic form, and this work especially has that thorough unity and integrity as a whole which we admire in the great models before him. Nothing can be more unjust than to charge him, in these Symphonies, the Concerto in A minor, &c., with throwing away the traditions of the Symphonic form. Here there is not only a leading motive worked into the texture of each part like organic fibre; but the motives of one movement reappear in another, knitting it all logically and poetically together. Thus the little phrase out of which the first Allegro is wrought is born already in the midst of the thoughtful, sombre Introduction, where after an opening crash in unison of all the orchestra, the middle instruments, reeds, &c., flow in sixths (3-4 time) with pleading accent. Then comes the Romanza in A minor, a quaint and lovely melody, so serious and earnest, sung by violoncello (how beautifully FRIES played it!) and oboe in octaves, which calls up very naturally a reminiscence of the slow Introduction, and this muses on in undercurrent while a new subject, a delicious, cool, fresh passage in triplets (sixteenths) sets in from the first violins. That Romanza is an exquisite poem and justifies its title.

The Scherzo, which follows in the original key, in sharp, wilful, almost surly accents, reminds one of now and then a strong Minuetto of that sort in Mozart, and has like emphatic unity and conciseness; its stern mood melts into a fascinating Trio in B flat, the first violins first leaning on a syncopated note and then gliding off in a smooth, liquid passage, made of phrases of six notes. This gradually dies out, weaker and weaker, murmurs itself in fragments, goes to sleep;—the tempo is held back, while reeds and lower strings heave a few tranquil sighs, and suddenly, pianissimo, with tremolo accompaniment, in doubly slow time, that leading phrase of the first Allegro steals back in the violins, and mysteriously the whole orchestra awakes and swells to a sublime climax, holding out on a full dominant seventh chord, which fills the mind with expectation. This sea-breeze before dawn, as it were, is the transition to the Finale; it harbingers the return, with renewed strength and startling martial accompaniment, of that same dear phrase of the first Allegro. The new and bolder theme however prevails; relieved by episodes, one of which is like a sweet gush of tenderness out of the heart (Adagio) of the Choral Symphony. The bit of martial fugue into which it determines itself towards the end, the loud and stern brass passages, and finally the rushing Presto are grandly exciting. Indeed the whole movement teems with glorious ideas, as when the mind in a creative mood gets thoroughly wrought up and summons all its swift faculties about it; so that the Finale now seems to us (as it did not ten years ago) the logical, clear climax and conclusion to a noble and sincere Art product. Much might be said of the fine instrumentation, the clear individualization of parts in the harmonic web, and so on; but without any such analysis of detail, the ideal, earnest, noble character of the whole Symphony was sure to impress itself on such an audience in such a performance.

Cherubini's Overture to "Les Abencérages" (first time) made a very pleasant opening to the concert; it is a light, but very genial, artistic composition, and only increased the desire to know all Cherubini's overtures. The breezy and invigorating "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, full of the woods, of chivalry and romance, (its mystical ghost-seeing episode only making the whole by contrast more brilliant and inspiring) was an admirable close.

Yesterday's Concert (of which hereafter) contained Gade's C-minor Symphony; Overtures to "The Water-Carrier," by Cherubini, and to "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Beethoven's second Piano Concerto, in B flat, and Schubert's Fantasia, op. 15, arranged for orchestra and piano by Liszt:—both played by Mr. B. J. LANG.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT will be on Friday, the 15th inst., and then Mme. CAMILLA URSO, anxious still to fulfil her engagement with the Association, has kindly offered to play the Mendelssohn Concerto, &c., as before announced. There will also be a Piano Concerto, by Hummel, in A minor, played by Mr. J. C. D. PARKER. The Symphony will be another charming one by Mozart (in D, without Minuet); the Overtures, that to "Fierabras," by Schubert, and that by Beethoven to "Egmont."

CARLYLE PETERSILEA's second "Schumann Soirée" (postponed by the great snow storm to last Saturday) drew a goodly audience, and was highly interesting both by its unique, rich programme and the young pianist's superb execution of so many large and extremely difficult compositions.

- 1 Grand Sonata, Op. 11.....Schumann.
- 2 Zuleika.....Mendelssohn.
- 3 Concerto, E Minor, Op. 11. Last two movements. Chopin.
- 4 a. Spring Night }.....Schumann.
- b. Dedication. }
- 5 Concerto in A Minor. Op. 54.....Schumann.
- 6 Barcarolle.....Schubert.
- 7 Variations, for two Pianos. Op. 46.....Schumann.

Every student of the master composers must have welcomed this first opportunity to hear that early, very ambitious, and very characteristic Sonata by Schumann. In itself it is not very edifying; it struggles painfully with form; is full of strange contrasts, which we suppose explain the meaning of its original "Davidbündler" title of "Florestan and Eusebius;" wearies by its recurrences and long stretches of thankless short, dry rhythm, and yet more by its heavy gloom; while it has some rich and striking passages. On the whole, it seems to us to justify what Wasielewski says of it, for which we refer the reader to our last number. But it was nevertheless interesting to have this significant specimen from the fermenting early period of Schumann, when his genius flashed forth such promise, but before he had attained to clear mastery of form except in smaller efforts. We hope Mr. Petersilea will also give us the other Sonata, in G minor.

In the A-minor Concerto, which he played with masterly clearness, firmness, and unflagging ease, and in the Chopin movements, he had the orchestral parts well suggested by Mr. LANG on a second piano. The Variations for two pianos were extremely interesting and rewarding.

Miss EDITH ABELL, with a bright young voice, clear and telling, has an easy, clever execution, with a good deal of abandon, but has hardly caught the spirit of those fine songs by Schumann and Schubert. Mr. SHARLAND played the accompaniments creditably.

AMATEUR CONCERT. Last Monday evening the Vocal Club which for several years has studied so much of the choicest choral music under the direction of Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, and which has attained to remarkable unity, precision and chaste expression in its execution, gave another of those soirées to invited friends. These entertainments have established for themselves so high a character and have regaled and instructed so many listeners (quite as many as attend any Chamber Concerts) that they deserve a place in the musical record of each year in Boston. This time the programme was delightful, and so was the singing.

First came the Kyrie, (soli and chorus) by Robert Franz; then the Cradle Song from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, beautifully sung of course by Mrs. HARWOOD; then a most impressive Incarnatus (trio and chorus) from the Mass in E flat by Schubert, new to us; then a couple of part-songs: "O fly with me," by Boie, and Mendelssohn's "Nightingale," given with rare perfection. A couple of Duets: Hiller's Abendlied and Mendelssohn's "May-bells and Flowers," were delicately rendered by two amateurs, sisters. The exquisite Chords of Fairies from the first scene of Oberon was enough to make that dainty monarch smile in his sleep. Mrs. HARWOOD sang a couple of Franz songs; and then came a new part-song by Mr. Parker, strikingly original in character, to Longfellow's "A wind came up out of the sea," and another, an old favorite, by Mendelssohn: "The Forest Birds." Finally the 114th Psalm by Mendelssohn, for double chorus: "When Israel out of Egypt came," &c., grandly impressive. The rich contralto, and chaste, artistic style of Mrs. CART was pleasant to hear in several solo passages. But the concert is to be repeated; so we need not say more now.

Mrs. J. S. CART's Complimentary Concert on Wednesday evening, in the Music Hall, was a success. All was good of its kind, only the programme was too long. An orchestra of twenty-five, under ZERRAHN, played Beethoven's Fidelio overture and Seventh Symphony, and the Tannhäuser March. CAMILLA URSO's playing, in the Fantaisie Caprice of Vieuxtemps and the Elegie of Ernst, was perfection, as to purity and fineness of tone, grace and unbroken continuity of bowing, and the most feminine refinement of artistic style throughout. Mrs. CART loses nothing of the purple bloom or tenderness of her voice, and sang charmingly a Cavatina from Mercadante's Giuramento, a Romance from Halévy, and in Rossini's Quis est homo, with Miss FISHER, of Cambridge. The latter lady is a young debutante, whose clear, sweet soprano voice, good style and feeling give high promise. She sang the Scena from Der Freyschütz quite acceptably. Miss HOUSTON limited herself to a Scotch Ballad, "Mary of Argyle," which she sang very expressively, and to a share in the Angel Trio from Elijah. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER played in his usual artistic style, the Capriccio brilliant of Mendelssohn, with orchestra. The audience was large, appreciative, and could not testify too frequently or too warmly its respectful admiration for the lady and the artist in compliment to whom the concert had been arranged.

MR. PERABO's fourth "Schubert Matinée," on Thursday, was made up wholly of Schubert compositions. Of this hereafter.

NEXT IN ORDER. To-night, PETERSILEA's third "Schumann Soirée," with the Quintette Club and Miss Ryan.

To-morrow evening, a huge GILMORE's Sacred Concert, with orchestra and chorus (Catholic) and great organ: Camilla Urso; Alice Dutton (to play Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto); Mr. Willcox, Mr. Powers, Miss Riddell, Dr. Guilmette, &c.

Friday, 15th, Symphony Concert.

Sunday, 17th, Oratorio, Handel's "Jephtha," by the Handel and Haydn Society, with Mme. PERABA.—The "Creation" soon to follow.

Monday, 18th, the CONCERT FOR THE CRETANS, for full programme of which see advertisement.

Saturday, 23d, Mme. PERABA gives a classical Chamber Concert with CARL ROSA and OTTO DRESEL.

ON THE TABLE. We had laid ourselves out this week for the discussion of several big topics:—Philosophy of the Fine Arts, about which we have been copying a very interesting and able article from the North American Review, with whose classification of the Arts we cannot at all agree;—Thayer's Life of Beethoven (first Vol., in German);—Mr. Eichberg's new "Conservatory of Music," which we hope will succeed (with the right kind of success);—the Harvard Musical Association, as it has just again read its horoscope in the genial, roseate mirror of the annual supper;—some sort of review of long accumulating heaps of new or newly published music; besides a fortnight of Maretzek's Opera, of which the only new feature, except fair revivals, but not fine, of the always new "Il Barbiere" and of "La Favorita," was the French Herold's "Zampa," an effective, genial work, of rather superficial character, imitating (at a great distance) Don Giovanni in its statue business and in the depicting of grotesque, Leporello-like terror, but which made a hit;—three farewell Bateman Concerts, too, which offered nothing new (though everything welcome) except the accession of the best contralto in the country, Adelaide Phillips, and the romantic interest which henceforth attaches to the conjunction of two prime stars in that constellation, the full-blown prima donna and the blushing rosebud namely;—but time and fatalities prevent. The great snow storm, interrupting outward business and travel, is only typical of influences that have blocked the highways and by-ways of our thoughts. We hope to live to do better.

PHILADELPHIA.—A new musical society, called the "Mendelssohn Society," has been established under the direction of Messrs. Jean Luis and H. G. Thunder, and already numbers 250 voices in its chorus. It made its debut in a "Grand Private Concert" (why grand?) at the Musical Fund Hall, Saturday evening, Jan. 19. The Bulletin says of it:

Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was very well sung in some of its parts, but needed a great deal more rehearsal to bring out its full expression and to develop the capacity of the really fine chorus. In the "Choral Fantasia," the Society acquitted itself very creditably, and this beautiful composition of Beethoven's, hitherto almost unknown in Philadelphia, will be established as a great favorite with our musical world. Mendelssohn's "National Songs" and his Four-part song, "On the Sea," were the real successes of the evening. They were sung with a degree of spirit, precision and accuracy which showed careful and thorough rehearsal and a good appreciation of the great composer. The selection from "Il Trovatore," with which the audience was threatened in the first programme, was judiciously withdrawn and a pretty English duet, "Flow gently, Deva," was well sung by Mrs. Behrens and Mr. Roberts, in its place. It would have been better for the success of the concert and the credit of the Society if the integrity of the programme had been preserved by striking out "Rigoletto" as well as "Trovatore."

The spirit of Mendelssohn was gloriously avenged upon his unfaithful worshippers who had set up an altar to the Italian idol, in the very temple called by his name. Why the quartet from "Rigoletto" was introduced into the programme, it is difficult to imagine. But since it was there, it was perhaps fortunate that it was so badly sung that there will be no excuse in future for intruding Verdi where, with all his peculiar genius, he is so utterly out of place. Without particularizing this performance more than is necessary, suffice it to say that the tenor, who evidently felt that the burden of the quartet was on his shoulders, seemed to have acquired all the contortions of the Italian style, without its intonation, purity or finish. Miss Blackburne bravely labored to rescue the performance from disgrace, and it was probably owing to her powerful voice and attractive personal style, that the audience actually encored it. It was sung a little worse the second time than before, and the curtain fell, we hope forever, on the anomaly of giving Verdi's music at a Mendelssohn concert.

The instrumental part of the concert was in the hands of the Germania orchestra, and, as usual, was thoroughly satisfactory, while Mr. Thumler played the piano accompaniments, on a Steck grand, with excellent precision and expression. The conductor, Mr. Jean Luis, is entitled to great praise for his management of the whole concert. His chorus was admirably balanced, and it was easy to see that he was thoroughly master of his business. We have rarely seen so large a chorus and orchestra held so well in hand, or led with such an intelligent alertness to all the requirements of the occasion. While the rhythm was admirably marked, there was a want of due modulation in the chorus passages, but that was only attributable to the short time devoted to the rehearsals, which precluded the possibility of that fine shading which only comes with time and hard practice.

The Mendelssohn Society is now fairly embarked in its generous and friendly emulation of the older Handel and Haydn Society. It contains an unusual amount of fine material in all the parts, and it has chosen a field of music so rich and varied that there is no possibility of its being exhausted.

The same journal, for Jan. 22, informs us:

This week is rich in fine musical entertainments. On Thursday afternoon we have Mr. Jarvis's second matinee of the season, at the foyer of the Academy. The programme includes Beethoven's Trio in B flat (op. 11), for piano, clarionette and violoncello; Chopin's Allegro de Concert (op. 56), piano solo, by Mr. Jarvis; Mozart's Sonata in A major for piano and violin; Schumann's Quartet in E flat (op. 47), for piano, violin, viola and violoncello. Mr. Jarvis will be assisted by Messrs. Gaertner, Schmitz, Plagemann and Kammerer.

On Saturday evening, the second of Messrs. Jarvis and Schmitz's Symphony concerts will be given at the Musical Fund Hall. The first of this series was a great success, and the second concert presents even greater attractions. The grand orchestra, under Mr. Schmitz, numbering about fifty instruments, will perform the Oberon Overture of von Weber, and Mozart's Symphony in C. (Jupiter No. 4.) Camilla Urso, the famous violinist, will play Mendelssohn's Concerto (op. 64), with orchestral accompaniment, and also Vieuxtemps's Fantasia Caprice, an exquisite violin solo. Mr. Jarvis will give the last two movements of Chopin's Concerto, in E minor, (op. 11) with orchestra.

Concert Overture, op. 75 (first time). . . . . Kalliwoda.
Nocturne—Midsummer Night's Dream. . . . . Mendelssohn.
Hymn's Festive Sounds—Waltz. . . . . Lanner.
Allegretto Scherzando from Eighth Symphony. . . . . Beethoven.
Overture—Hebrides (by request). . . . . Mendelssohn.
Song, Erl King (by request). . . . . F. Schubert.
Duet from Zampa. . . . . T. Herold.

NEW YORK. The Philharmonic Society (Bergmann Conductor) gave its third concert, at Steinway Hall, last Saturday evening. We hear much praise of the performance of the orchestra of eighty, and much satisfaction expressed with the new Symphony, in D minor, by Volkmann. The Overtures were Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" and Cherubini's "Water-Carrier." Mr. William Mason played Beethoven's piano Concerto in G, and Mr. Wenzel Copta, newly come, a violin Concerto of Vieuxtemps with much éclat.—The fourth Concert, March 9, will contain Beethoven's second Symphony, Liszt's "Tasso, Poème Symphonique," and Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture. (The Evening Post speaks of Volkmann's Symphony as "abounding in beautiful though reticent (!) passages.")

German Opera still struggles bravely on in the small Thalia theatre, not very well supported. Mmes. Johannsen and Rotter and the basso Hermanns have joined the troupe, the latter re-appearing in his capital old part of the jailor in Fidelio. Flotow's Stradella was brilliantly sung by Johannsen as Leonore and Himmer as Stradella, together with William Formes, Ulrichs and others. The company is still said to lack a tenore di grazia in Habelmann's place, and the young director, Nenendorff, is declared too careless and superficial to fill the place of Anschütz or Bergmann. The next operas were to be Tannhäuser and Gläser's Des Adlers Horst, a simple, antiquated thing long popular in Germany.

The new Academy of Music—now pronounced safe, in spite of the presentations of grand juries, by the superintendent of public buildings in his annual report—will be opened by Manager Maretzek, and his excellent company, on March 7th. The regular season will be prefaced by a bal d'opera, similar to that which last winter set the fashionable world agog.

The French Opera has come to a timely end, if the following account, from the Weekly Review, be just:

The last performance given by the troupe was that of "Orphée aux Enfers," and, although it is a rule not to speak ill of the dead, we confess that the performance of the opera was partly amusing, partly an insult to the public. The audience, which had been attracted by the name of the opera as well as by recollections of its performance in Paris, was very large, and every seat was taken. But the curtain did not go up, and one of the singers stepped before it and excused the management on account of the sudden indisposition of one of the singers, which would be removed, however, in a few minutes. We should have been much pleased if this announcement had not proved true, since the entire performance gave just cause for derisive laughter and disgust. We believe that the opera was given without the slightest rehearsal. To say that the orchestra was bad is mild. The chorus sang in German. The person, who had the hardihood to appear in the part of Venus, was accompanied by loud laughter throughout her little chanson; the scenery was wretched; the Olympus was represented by a drawing-room: in short, the performance surpassed all ideas which mortal man can have of a farce. If it was not hissed, and the actors and singers were not driven from the scene, this is owing to the great forbearance of the public. After the performance of this opera, a dispute arose between the artists, which led to the happy dissolution of their contract with each other, and thus endeth the second attempt at giving French opera without a proper management.

The Bateman troupe, as such, have dispersed. The closing concert under that name took place at Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening of last week. Crowds, ovations to the several artists, programme doubled in length by encores. But "the selections" (so the Albion says) "were of a singularly ancient and well-worn character, Mr. Hatton, or whoever makes them, evidently fearing to add the shock of novelty to the other trying emotions which a farewell performance might naturally be expected to excite."

Mme. Parepa, with Messrs. Rosa and Mills, are engaged for Mr. Harrison's classical and sacred concerts from Jan. 27 to the end of February.

ROCHESTER, N. Y. Mr. Tracy's "Piano-forte Recitals" are given for the improvement of his scholars and a few personal friends who take an interest in the promotion of piano-forte art. Some of his pupils take part in them. In the third Recital of the present series (Jan. 31), Mr. Tracy himself was to play three Beethoven Sonatas, namely that in G, op. 31, No. 1, that in E flat, op. 7, and the "Moonlight" (C-sharp minor). One of the young ladies was set down for Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto and a couple of Chopin's Etudes (Nos. 8 and 11, of op. 10); another, for Weber's brilliant Polonaise in E; a third, for the "Invitation to the Dance"; and a young gentleman for the other Weber Polonaise (in E flat). The fourth Recital is to contain three more Sonatas of Beethoven, Weber's Concert-stück, and two Sonatas by Clementi.

The Nightingale.

(Imitated from the Italian of Francesco di Lemene.)

Sweet Philomela, lovely, hapless maiden,
Death at her heart, with wrong and insult laden,
Wept, crushed by sorrows all too much for woman ;—
Great Jove, that bitter grief from heaven beholding, Pitied, and took away her semblance human,
In a bird's form the sweet, sad soul enfolding.
One eve, Love, o'er a leafy woodland winging,
Heard a rich lay, far through the forest ringing,
And pausing, with the mellow song enchanted,
Beheld lone Philomel among the roses ;
To rival Jove's sweet miracle Love panted,
So caught ere died her golden closes,
And gave her Lilla's form, alluring maiden,
With gift of soulful song divinely laden !

Thayer's Life of Beethoven*.

(Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.)

In the composition of a book about a great artist or his life—if by accurate study of sources and thoughtful criticism of results the book undertakes to be conclusive in some definite direction—there are various things to be considered. In the first place the relative importance of the artist himself; then the circumstances under which he came into the world and which had an influence on his development; then the question, what has been already communicated respecting him, and whether these previous communications have any claim to real scientific worth and credibility, or whether they contain much that is false, whereby a distorted light has been shed over him. According to circumstances, therefore, the description of an artist's life may be made short and concise, or long and entering into a thousand details.

In regard to BEETHOVEN the case stands thus: In the first place we have here to do with an artist of the very first rank, who on the one hand, at the very sight of his person, offers the psychologist the most difficult problems and gives him a host of at least seeming contradictions to solve; while, on the other hand, by his rich relations to the outer world, by his connections and intercourse with persons in high position he presents a mass of interesting matter which does not come into the account with other artists. In the second place there are already current about him a multitude of shorter and longer communications, which taken together are unsatisfactory. Yet it must be admitted that the notices of Wegeler and Ries, little as they aimed at completeness, and much as the anecdotal character prevails in them, especially in the second part, gave, of all that had yet appeared, the most reliable information and the best picture of Beethoven. Seyfried's meagre communications are scarcely worth mentioning; but even Schindler's Biography is only in so far trustworthy as it concerns the Beethoven whom Schindler had personally known and with whom he had had intercourse. Moreover it is distinguished by a truly bewildering want of order in the laying out and presentation of the subject. Lenz has given himself much pains with regard to the chronology of the works; but he lived too far away from the places where reliable information could be got on many points, and he made his books unenjoyable through the bombast of his fantastical mania for exposition. Marx ensnared himself in philosophical æsthetic phrases, and the Ariadne's thread, that should have helped him out of his self-made labyrinth, slipped thereby through his hands. At the same time he neglected all careful study of sources, even where they lay right before his nose, and so he heaped up a mass of errors and imperfect statements in regard to facts, which could only beget new confusion. Finally Nohl—to name him also—had actually availed himself of certain sources, passing others by, and bridged over all the holes and chasms of his material with pictures of his fancy, with questionable hypotheses, unmeaning phrases, and odd speculations. And here we must not pass by the fact in silence, that he has taken many of his communications from an earlier English essay of our Thayer (Atlantic Monthly, 1858), which he knew from a French translation. Of the deluge of pamphlets we of course say nothing.

When now a man like A. W. THAYER, born in a foreign quarter of the globe, belonging to an entirely different calling than to that of Art, undertakes, with a thousand sacrifices in time, labor and money, after long years of indefatigable researches, in which no source of information anywhere to be found remains unused, to clear up all the chaos, to put aside all that is false or uncertain, or at least honestly designate it as such, and so present us with a "Life" of Beethoven, showing us the person of the master in an unsifted light, neither flattered nor perverted, such an undertaking must, as we believe, be met by the lively gratitude of the artistic world. And with this gratitude will be coupled joyful greeting on the part of musical criticism, all the more heartily when it perceives what a warm reverence for the master, and what a simple, unsophisticated striving after truth has guided the author's pen in every line. When, furthermore, the book appears and through the mouth of the (German) translator, in full understanding of course with the author, declares beforehand, that it merely wishes to present the materials, in as pure a state as possible, for the future expounder of Beethoven's artistic labors, then may we not require that criticism speak with the tone of trust and high esteem of such a thankworthy effort?

The biographer of Beethoven cannot help it, that the master, who lived and died in Vienna, passed his childhood and youth far away from there in the Electoral capital of Bonn; that it is just this youthful period over which lay the greatest want of clearness; that all the books hitherto have furnished only unsatisfactory or false accounts of it.

Hence what we should blame in a biography of any other master, these exceedingly minute and copious details of time and place, this reaching so far back into times when the artist's grandfather first began an humble career as musician; this documentary presentation of many circumstances related even though remotely to the main matter,—all this in the present case we may consider justified, nay entitled to our thanks, because just here the circumstances are different from what they are in a hundred other cases.

The volume before us contains first of all two Prefaces in the form of letters: The Author to the Translator, and the Translator to the Author, neither of which is to be overlooked, since they show the mutual relation of the two, as well as their common standpoint towards the given material. From them we learn that the (German) translator, who lives in Bonn, has in many points completed and enriched the author's labor by additions of his own. It also appears from the latter part of his letter, that he is still more decidedly than the author of the opinion, that the biography of an artist is not finished with a correct description of his life alone, be it ever so thorough and reliable. We have here the recognition of a principle which we have always represented, and which all the more naturally had to be represented by the Translator, since he has himself taken part in Art criticism, a thing entirely foreign to the Author.

The book before us is only the first volume. How many volumes the whole work will form, we are not told; and probably for peculiar reasons the number could not be absolutely fixed, although the author, to all appearances, has his material fully collected. The contents of this first volume are divided into three books, of which the first is headed: "Music and Musicians in Bonn from 1689 to 1784." It contains six chapters: 1) The Electorate of Cologne. Joseph Clement. 2) Clement Augustus and his Capelle. Ludwig van Beethoven (the grandfather). 3) Maximilian Frederic and his court musicians. 4) Continuation of the accounts of music and musicians under Max Frederic. 5) Max Frederic's National Theatre. 6) Musical personalities of Bonn. The city in the year 1770.—This first Book fills 80 pages, a space which will not be found excessive, if we consider that we have here to do, not with secondary matters, superfine distinctions about Westphalians and Rhinelanders (à la Nohl), or politico-social expositions, but with music, with that musical institution and those persons to whom Beethoven was to owe his first impulses, his first instruction and furtherance. It certainly is not a matter of indifference, to know how that Art institute arose, and what its character, at which Beethoven afterwards, playing the viola in its orchestra, was to get familiar with the most important operas of that time; to form a nearer acquaintance with the musicians who helped build it up, with the princes whose taste determined the spirit in which it was conducted, not to speak of that more general sort of culture which was prepared and furthered through the National Theatre and therefore through the condition of poetry in Bonn. It certainly seems to us too, that a far clearer picture of those times and circumstances is given by the printing of old documents, than by description and narration.

With the Second Book, which occupies 147 pages, and is superscribed: "Beethoven in Bonn, 1770 to 1792," our master himself enters into the narrative. It contains 13 chapters: 1) The Beethoven Family. 2) Beethoven's Childhood. 3) Instruction under Neefe. The Boy's Talent made a Source of Income. 4) Elector Max Francis. 5) Max Francis and Music. The Court Capelle in the year 1784. 6) Further Destinies of Beethoven. His visit to Vienna. 7) The Breuning family. Count Waldstein. Domestic affairs. 8) The National Theatre under Max Francis. 9) Repertoire of the Electoral National Theatre. 10) Musical events and Anecdotes. 11) Supplementary about Persons and Society. Departure from Bonn. 12) What did Beethoven compose in Bonn? 13) The Theatre and Music in Bonn again. The curtain falls.

Of the Third Book, which is to contain Beethoven's first Vienna period (1792 to 1800), this Volume gives us (in 48 pages) the first three chapters: 1) Beethoven in Vienna. Studies with Haydn and Albrechtsberger. 2) Music in Vienna in the year 1793. 3) Beethoven's appearance as Virtuoso and Composer. An Appendix (of 83 pages) then gives a number of documents, which found no room in the text, and a couple of excursus by the translator.

For this whole period the author had at his command, besides the most careful use of the earlier, often very remote literature, a series of new and hitherto unused sources, which we will here specify. In the first line stand the Provincial Archives in Düsseldorf, which possess most of the Acts and Documents of the Electorate of Cologne, especially those which relate to music; these were for the first time fully explored and turned to account, first by Thayer, and afterwards by Deiters, for this volume. To these are joined a series of periodical writings of those days, among which we may name the Bonner Anzeigen and Intelligenzblätter of the last century, the Vienna Zeitung, Court-calender, Text-books, &c.; also the old church books of Bonn are employed for the purpose of fixing dates when required. Beethoven's own notes have furnished the author already in this volume with various interesting material; especially worth mention is the little Day-book about the journey to Vienna and the first days there. Besides all this, the author has not shrunk from the often onerous trouble of personal inquiry, through which he has got at some exceedingly important communications concerning the remote Bonn period. Finally with the new sources must be reckoned the notes, published in the Appendix by Deiters, of an old Herr Fischer, who died recently in Bonn, in whose house the Beethoven family resided a long time; from these, with careful use, we get on the whole a faithful and extremely life-like picture of the Beethovens' parental house, which heretofore was wanting.

One sees already by this enumeration, that the author has not shrunk from the most remote and unfrequented paths in order to get track of the truth. To be sure, one who simply wants to read for entertainment, will find himself deterred by such a heaping up of documents; but one who cares to get a clear and truthful picture of the case, will find real satisfaction in documents thus speaking for themselves.

[The article ends with specimens of the new matter which Thayer's book contains, some of which we propose to translate, yielding to the eager curiosity of our readers; although it will be an awkward and a thankless task to translate back into English that which was originally written in English, and which is bound to appear at last in the author's own vernacular.—ED.]

Joseph Louis D'Ortigue.

[From the London Orchestra.

For the last forty years the French art and church papers have teemed with contributions both curious and interesting, on a system of music affirmed to be both artistic and scientific, but peculiar to the offices of religion, and in no way connected with the vernacular language of the present day. The ordinary rule, with respect to religious music is a simple one. As to science, music being founded on unvarying rules, recognized by science, there cannot be one science for the church and another for the world. As to art, the best of its kind, its highest development, is that which alone can be considered classical, and there cannot be one degree for the church and another for the world. The only proper distinction, therefore, peculiar to religious music, is that of the spirit, expressive of the feelings of the human being engaged in its highest and noblest employment of worshipping the Creator. The theory to which we have been alluding is quite opposed to this definition of religious music. It maintains that the ordinary language-rhythms now prevalent, from the alliance of music with the language of every-day life, are totally out of place in music for the Sanctuary; that the common and well known keys in modern music are not the collocation of tones insisted upon by the practice of the church; that the church has its own peculiar artistic gamuts, giving rise to chords and progressions unknown to the outward world, or if known, forbidden by all rational artists; and that it is the duty of all church composers, properly so called, to study this system of venerable art-song, as being the only legitimate expression of what is called the voice of the church in music. The leading advocate of this system is just dead, departing from this life at Paris, about a month ago. He was the well-known Joseph Louis D'Ortigue, for many years a lawyer and judge, and afterwards musician, littérateur, and art-critic. Articles from his prolific pen are to be found in almost every Parisian journal of repute, but the work by which his name will live will be found in the great "Dictionnaire de l'Abbé Migné." For this voluminous and comprehensive church lexicon M. D'Ortigue supplied nearly all the articles on the subject of church music. The one object of his life was that of plain chant and the music of the middle ages. He was the great advocate and benign critic of all the publications by Coussemaker, Le Père Lambilot, L'Abbé de Lamennais, and other revivalists of the ancient tones. At the instigation of M. Guizot, he wrote his celebrated Essay on the Music of the middle Ages, which procured him the professorship of plain chant at the college of Henri Quatre, and led to his appointment as one of the commissioners of inquiry into the robberies of the manuscripts from the Royal Library.

In 1856 M. D'Ortigue sent forth to the public his peculiar theory of accompanying the Gregorian chants; a theory which gave rise to much discussion, being strongly disapproved by those who professed to have ears, but much exalted by those who did not mind being laughed at for having no ears at all. He failed to put out the fact that the musical system of the ancient church is that of a system of tetrachords, or series of four sounds, and not a system of octaves. That the outside sounds of each tetrachord are unchangeable, but the two inside sounds are so; and that upon these facts grew out the system of octaves known as the church tones. The school of the alla capella is not a system of every sound in the gamut bearing its own chord, but a consideration of the sounds in the octave, divided first arithmetically, and then harmonically; and allowing for the change of the two inside tones of the tetrachord.

The efforts of M. Choron for the revival of the alla capella music in Paris were much in unison with the feeling of M. D'Ortigue, and received his highest commendation. But M. D'Ortigue did not confine his pen to church music. He wrote upon the organists, Lefebvre-Wely, J. N. Lemmens, M. Boëly, and others; upon the operas of Rossini, the "Troyens" of Hector Berlioz, and upon the operas of Meyerbeer. The gatherings up by Meyerbeer of the weird-like snatches from the tones of the old-world music proved specially grateful to the mediæval mind of our art-critic, who thrilled with delight when hearing the unearthly chant of the Three Imposters in the "Prophète;" and, during the life of its composer, M. D'Ortigue was one of the foremost in heaping adulatory paragraphs upon the laurel brow of this distinguished man. Upon the death of Meyerbeer, M. D'Ortigue wrote a remarkable eulogy on the character and works of his hero, whom he describes as passing a life of incessant labor, achieving a glorious career, evidencing a genius the lustre of which no length of time could imperil or diminish. But "a living dog is better than a dead lion," and scarce had a year elapsed when M. D'Ortigue qualified his former expressions by stating what he really thought, and what he requested the public to take as his real opinion. "Meyerbeer's genius," he wrote, "was not that of the first order. He has none of that divine fire which emits the generous and fruitful heat calling into life and being such melodies as those of Mozart, Beethoven, and Rossini. There is no pure gold about the man, and his own conscience is always secretly warning him of the insufficiency of his funds. As he deceives others, so he deceives himself by his subterfuges, ruses, and trickeries. He was by nature timid, ever doubting and fearing; he never risked anything, never struck unless sure of his blow, and never gave himself headway unless all was prepared for a certain success. The time is now come," says M. D'Ortigue, "in which I may speak out plainly, and I speak out in this way because it is the first time that I have been at liberty to do so, and I profit by the opportunity. When an artist spends his life in gathering flatterers around him, it is only becoming that the ministers of justice should pronounce sentence and a true verdict over his body."

We believe this last opinion of M. D'Ortigue upon Meyerbeer to be sincere, and one which nothing but the liberal hand of Meyerbeer kept from the public so long as the composer lived.

M. D'Ortigue stands amongst the first and foremost admirers of the genius of Charles Gounod. In 1855 he wrote in raptures of his "Sanctus," describing it as a morceau of grand and high inspiration, and on the production of the "St. Cecilia Mass" by this composer, M. D'Ortigue issued a careful and elaborate analysis, commending the greater part thereof in strong and eulogistic terms. He objected, however, to the short, dry, and energetic way in which the choir were required to utter the word Pax, in the Gloria. He says that the composer gave out the word Pax after the ordinary fashion of the crier in a court of justice calling out "Silence;" and that it was strictly an obedience to the very letter of the command of the Psalmist, "Bene psallite ei in vociferatione."

Among other essays by M. D'Ortigue, may be perused, with much pleasure and profit, those on the "Te Deum," "Requiem," and the "Christus," in three parts, of Hector Berlioz, and the "Christmas Carols" of Saboly, so well edited by M. F. Séguin. M. D'Ortigue was born in 1802.

The Musical Year 1866 of Paris.

To begin with the Grand Opera. During the commencement of the year the star of the "Africaine" was still in the ascendant, and on the 9th of March, that is, within ten months and a half of its first production, it reached its hundredth performance. The "Huguenots" took more than three years, "Guillaume Tell" more than five, "Lucia" six years and a half, and "La Favorita" eight years, to arrive at the same point. The merits of the work have been sufficiently discussed. The first novelty in the programme was the revival of Auber's "Le Dieu et La Bayadère," first given at the same house in 1830 with Nourrit, Mlle. Noblet, Taglioni, Damoreau-Cinti, and the basso Levasseur, all then in their prime. The cast on the present occasion was painfully incompetent, and all the charming music the work contained could not obtain more than a succès d'estime. This occurred at the end of January. The second of April brought us the second edition of "Don Juan" (for the first see notice on the Italiens). The work was respectably executed: only the two victims, Donna Anna and Donna Elvira were too short and too fat, and the joyous Zerlina was simply the definition of a line—length without breadth. Faure (Don Juan) and Odin (Leporello) were the only good exponents of their roles, for the Don Ottavio as an actor added an additional amount of water to the original "sky-blue" character of the part. Mlle. Mauduit made a first debut in "La Juive" about the same time, and showed us what she might be able to do were she kept a year longer at school. Next came an administrative affair; a decree, announcing that the Opera was no longer to form part of the Maison de l'Empereur, and was to be handed over, under certain conditions, to the tender mercies of a private speculator. The subvention was raised to the sum of nine hundred and twenty thousand francs (about £37,000). Many aspired to the management, but the real contest was between MM. Perrin and Roqueplan, and the former was successful. A reprise of "Giselle" (ballet), and of "La Juive" (why call it a reprisette), was of no importance, and the only real novelty introduced during the year was a ballet "La Source," in three acts and four tableaux, by MM. Nuitter and St. Léon: the music of the first and fourth tableaux by M. Minkons, that of the second and third by M. Leo Deliber. This was a quasi-success, but did not hold its ground firmly. The idea of sharing the music between two composers was bad, and the dancers were not the deus ex machina. Thus we have two acts of ballet as the year's doings at a theatre whose manager is bound to produce at least one grand opera, and another in two acts, and one grand and one small ballet in the year. I quote the cahier des charges from memory, but fear that the actual stipulations are more than what I mention—I am sure they are not less.

The Opera Comique went gaily on its "Voyage en Chine" until Feb. 5th, when "Fior d'Aliza," taken from Lamartine's novel of the same name, music by M. Victor Massé, was produced. Notwithstanding the evident defects of the poem, defects which consisted more in the use of situations already known and well treated by other composers than in any absolute "badness" of construction, M. Massé's charming music would have insured a success had it been better interpreted. But with a cold tenor like M. Achard (a "stick" is, I believe, the proper term), and with a première chanteuse like Mme. Vandenhuevel Duprez, who is, I willingly allow, a first-rate singer, but for musicians only, and whose voice never crosses the footlights, what can be the result? M. Massé's half-failure was more honorable to him than the many brought-about and brought-up successes; and he may console himself with the thought that he has "musical baggage" enough to be able to afford one. Flotow's "Zilda," a pretty, sparkling work, was given in May, and pleased greatly. June brought us an enlarged edition of Gounod's "La Colombe," a charming opera already produced at Baden-Baden in 1861. "José Maria," set to music by M. Jules Cohen, came in July—a bad piece and "imitative" music, not without some musicianly talent, was the general verdict. August brought us Mehul's "Joseph," more an oratorio than an opera, much less opera-comique—a revival attended with great success, thanks to the beautiful music and the good interpretation. Next came M. Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," so lately noticed in these pages that I need but mention its name; and with the remark that an opera in three acts, by M. Victor Massé, provisionally entitled "Le Fils du Brigadier" is in active rehearsal, I may close my notice on the doings of the past year at the Salle Favart. Total: six operas, seventeen acts.

At the Lyrique I must begin with the mention of "La Fiancée d'Abydos," four acts, by M. Jules Adenis, music by M. A. Barthe. This was given on 30th December, 1865, but almost belongs to this year's history. A poem lengthened out from an one act cantata produced a distressing effect. The music deserved a better fate: M. Barthe has only to get hold of a real piece to show what he can do. In May we had the third and best edition of the three "Don Juans" in the field. Execution and ensemble splendid, and an orchestra such as no other theatre in Paris can boast of. The "Joyeuses Commères di Windsor," by Nicolai, produced at the end of the same month was very coldly received. June: "Le Sorcier," of a softening-of-the-brain tendency, and "Les Dragées de Suzette," a neat little work, were given a few days before the house closed for its annual congé.

Operations were resumed in August with "Marta" and Mlle. Nilsson, who by the way will leave us soon for a two years' engagement at 15,000 francs a month with Mapleson; at least, so they say. "Don Juan" and "Marta" (with an occasional performance of "Rigoletto," "Violetta" or "Richard") held the affiche until the 9th December, when an arrangement of "Der Freyschütz" was given with immense success, and will probably have a great run. Total, 5 operas, 11 acts.

The Italian season, which had commenced in October, 1865, was continued by the production of Mercadante's "Leonora" which was but coldly received. A ballet, "Gli Elementi," a divertissement by St. Leon, music by Pagni, came next, and once more proved how hopeless was the attempt made by the gentlemanly but obnoxious manager to render ballet an accepted institution in this theatre. On the first of March "Don Juan" No. 1 was "executed" in every sense of the word. A revival of the "Puritani" with Mlle. Patti as Elvira was a great attraction, and one of the best performances of the season. "La Fanciulla di Yalacca" was received in much the same way as the ballet noted above. "L'Italiana in Algeri" was revived in April for the debuts of Mlle. Mela, the "woman-tenor." This was a decided and well-deserved failure, and all the public's applause was reserved for Scialoja and Agnesi, who bore their trials with exemplary fortitude. The theatre closed on the 5th of May with a performance of "Il Casino di Campagna," music by the father of the illustrious phenomenon just mentioned above; this was a sad close to a generally good season. The troupe was excellent and included La Patti, Mmes. de la Grange, Vitali, Penco, Grossi Calderon, Zeise, &c., MM. Fraschini, Brignoli, Delle Sedie, Graziani, Agnesi, Zucchini, Scialoja, Selva Verger, &c. The usual repertoire, such as "Il Barbiere," "Rigoletto," "Trovatore," &c., was given in addition to the novelties mentioned above.

The theatre was re-opened October the 3rd with "La Sonnambula" interpreted by La Patti, MM. Nicolini and Verger. A great success for the lady and the baritone. Mlle. Lagrue made a deep impression in "Norma," and the fine tragic sentiment she displayed deserved the hearty and frequent encouragement it received. Then came a course of influenza which proved disastrous to the repertoire; and for some weeks everything went wrong. "Don Pasquale" gave M. Ketten the chance of a debut—the result was unimportant. Then came (Nov. 27) the turn of Pacini's "Saffo" for Mlle. Lagrue. The singer was superb, but the music commonplace and ineffective. "Ernani" for the debut of Mlle. Staëls, an American lady with a splendid soprano, was well executed. Pancani was fair as Ernani, Cresci was a good Carlo Quinto and Agnesi gave an original and splendid reading of the part of the chivalrous veglardo Don Silva. "L'Elisir d'Amore" with La Patti, Nicolini, Agnesi and Zucchini, I noticed in my last, and so find myself au pair with my compte rendu of the Italians.

With regard to the other lyric theatres—the Bouffes call for no particular mention; they have been half the year in Chancery, and have done but little during the rest of the time. I lately gave an account of the Fantaisies Parisiennes and its prosperity. The principal operas and operettas produced have been Hérold's "Rosières" 3 a, "Les Folies Amoureuses" 2 a, "Le Maître de Chapelle," "Le Chevalier Lubin," "Le Chanteur Florentin," &c.

Of course I cannot undertake to send you a list of all the concerts given during the last season, but will just mention the principal séances. The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire hardly maintains its high reputation, but seems to be going to the bad. Pasdeloup is on the contrary gaining ground every day. The Brothers Müller, the quartet players, produced a great sensation here. The Concerts of the Athénée (noticed a week or two ago) are doing well; Haydn's "Seasons" were remarkably rendered by all concerned. "Elijah" and Costa's "Naaman" are in rehearsal. Among the concerts of Chamber music, those conducted by MM. Alard, Maurin, Armingaud, Lamoureux, and de la Nux rank amongst the best. M. Wekerlin's Société de St. Cécile, and M. Georges Pfeiffer's concert, deserve special mention, and so does a séance given by M. Jacobi, first violin at the Opera; as for others their name is Legion.—Corr. Orchestra.

Mendelssohn's Greek Chorus Music.

In anticipation of the Concert for the Cretans (next Monday), the first part of which is to consist of music suggestive of the old classic glory of Greece, especially the Edipus chorus, we reproduce here a part of our record of the first public performance in this city (by the Orpheus Club, Dec. 19, 1857) of some of the noble music which Mendelssohn set to two of the tragedies of Sophocles. Our Cretan programme, to be more complete, should have contained all three of the choruses then given; but that would have left no room for the other parts, equally suggestive, the one of modern Greece as overrun by Turks, the other (Fifth Symphony) of the great hope of Freedom, the struggle and the triumph.

The features of the most intrinsic interest, as well as novelty, were the Choruses from the Greek tragedies, composed by Mendelssohn. We know no finer compositions for men's voices. Certainly our German Clubs have sung no other comparable to them. The ordinary part-song is a much smaller, humbler affair—simply, as its name denotes, a song, harmonized in four parts. But these Greek choruses are themes worked up, for single and double choir, with as much art and completeness, only not in the fugue form. (for the Fugue is Gothic, Christian, and not Greek), as the choruses in great oratorios. The poetic text demanded no less. Of course the problem with Mendelssohn was not and could not be to compose music that should be Greek; what was practicable was, to wed the noble words to music equally noble and expressive. A dignified, highly learned, as well as sympathetically poetic style was indispensable; and in these special choruses at least Mendelssohn has answered these requirements as happily and nobly as in any of his best works that are better known. They should have been heard with orchestra, of course, to have their full effect; but the elaborate accompaniments were made to yield the gist of their meaning by the fine piano-playing of Otto Dresel assisted by Mr. Leonhard. They would have derived more impressiveness, too, from a larger choir; and above all, from the theatrical completeness with which they were brought out, according to the original design, in Germany. Then the entire Greek tragedy was acted on the stage, with all its paradoi and episodions, and choregraphical manœuvres, circlings, and crossings of the chorus, &c. In short, the attempt was made, with all the means of the King of Prussia, and the classical lore of German Greek professors, to reproduce as closely as possible the whole machinery and method of the old Greek stage. Only music, which the Greeks had not, and for which their rude chant had to suffice, was here for the first time by modern Art supplied.

We suppose the "Bacchus" Chorus pleased the greater number by its fiery fortissimo. We were most interested in the chorus from the Edipus Coloneus. It is where the chorus (of old Athenians) welcome the blind, old, wandering king, led by his daughter An'igone, to Attica. A plain word-for-word version, such as we find in Bohn's Library, gives a better notion of the words than the rhymed paraphrase that was printed in the programme. Here it is:

Strophe.—Thou hast come, O stranger, to the seats of this land, renowned for the steed; to seats the fairest on earth, the chalky Colonus; where the vocal nightingale, chief abounding, trill her plaintive note in the green dells, tenanted the dark-hued ivy and the leafy grove of the god, untrodden, teeming with fruits, impervious to the sun, and unshaken by the winds of every storm; where Bacchus, the reveler, ever roams attending his divine nurses.

Antistrophe.—And ever day by day the narcissus, with its beauteous clusters, bursts into bloom by heaven's dew, the ancient coronet of the mighty goddesses, and the saffron with golden ray; nor do the sleepless founts of Cephissus that wander through the fields fail, but ever each day it rushes o'er the plains with its limpid wave, fertilizing the bosom of the earth; nor have the choirs of the muses loathed this clime; nor Venus, too, of the golden reign.

Strophe.—And there is a tree, such as I hear not to have ever sprung in the land of Asia, nor in the mighty Doric island of Pelops, a tree unplanted by hand, of spontaneous growth, terror of the hostile spear, which flourishes chiefly in this region, the leaf of the pale gray olive that nourishes our young. This shall neither any one in youth nor in old age, marking for destruction, and having laid it waste with his hand, bring to nought; for the eye that never closes of Morian Jove regards it, and the blue-eyed Minerva.

Antistrophe.—And I have other praise for this mother-city to tell, the noblest gift of the mighty divinity, the highest vaunt, that she is the great of chivalry, renowned for the steed and famous on the main; for thou, O sovereign Neptune, son of Saturn, hast raised her to this glory, having first, in these fields, founded the bit to tame the horse; and the well-rowed boat, dashed forth by the hand, bounds marvellously through the brine, tracking on the hundred-footed daughters of Nereus.

After a few bars of bright and quickening prelude, one choir commences in unison the first strophe—a beautiful theme, that breathes the peace and stillness of the place (the sacred grove of the Eumenides) falling on the weary spirit of the exile—all in unison, until the full-chord burst on the high climax note in the last line. Again the bright phrase of the instruments (but with a difference), and the opposite choir takes up the same strain (lovely enough to be repeated) to the words of the antistrophe, while the accompaniment, before limited to plain chords, melts into soft and liquid divisions at the mention of the dew-besprent narcissus and Cephissus' stream. Then the accompaniment sets out in hurried triplets, the music grows excited, and the first choir sings, in harmony, a higher and a bolder strain, about that wondrous tree, the olive, glory of Athens, swelled at length by entrance of the other choir to eight-part harmony. This strain, too, is echoed by the second choir, hymning that "other praise"; the enthusiasm mounts higher and higher, till it reaches its climax in the address to Neptune, where both choirs unite in a fortissimo, with full force of the instruments, and the first tenors soar to high B flat, as if unconsciously borne up above themselves. The descent from this high pitch of exaltation is exquisitely managed by a sustained monotone of the voices through four long measures (on the dominant), whence they slowly drop to the octave, holding the note while the instruments ascend and trill into the key-note, finishing the whole into perfection of symmetry with a modification of the bright figures of the prelude.

Two choruses were sung from the Antigone, instead of one as in the programme. The Bacchus Chorus was preceded by another (unannounced, and so misleading many) to these words:

Strophe.—Many are the mighty things, and nought is more mighty than man. He even sails beyond the sea, when whitened into foam with the wintry south wind's blasts, passing amid the billows that roar around; and the supreme of divinities, immortal, undecayed Earth, he furrows, his plows circling from year to year, turning up her soil with the offspring of the steed.

Antistrophe.—And ensnaring the brood of light-minded birds, he bears them away as his prey and the tribes of the monsters of the wild, and the marine race of the deep in the inwoven meshes of his nets, he, all-inventive man; and he masters by his devices the tenant of the fields, the mountain-ranging beast, and he will bring under the neck-encircling yoke the shaggy-maned horse, and the untameable mountain bull.

Strophe.—And he hath taught himself language and lofty wisdom, and the customs of civic law, and to avoid the cold and stormy arrows of uncomfortable frosts. With plans for all things, planless in nothing, meets he the future. Of the grave alone he shall not introduce escape; but yet he hath devised remedies against baffling disease. Having beyond belief a certain inventive skill of art, he at one time advances to evil and at another time to good. Observing the laws of the land, and the plighted justice of heaven, he is high in the state; but an outcast from the state is he, with whomsoever that which is not honorable resides by reason of audacity; neither may he dwell with me, nor have sentiments like mine, who acts thus.

The music to this is a sweet, tranquil, pensive Andante con moto in 6-8 measure; the voices for the most part in unison, the accompaniment in rich, smoothly-progressing harmony,—more figurative at the thought of the birds, &c., in the antistrophe—until the second strophe: "He hath taught himself language and lofty wisdom," where the strain becomes pia mosso and the voices part into harmony; strangely dark and thrilling is the modulation of the instruments at the thought of death! The same strain is worked up to the end with double chorus.

The Bacchus Chorus—fit conclusion to the concert—is more in the vein of the Wedding March, full of pomp and splendor, double chorus from the first, in full chords, in the triumphal key of D major, waxing ever stronger and louder, and whirling itself away one rapid blaze of many-voiced and brazen harmony. It is quite Bacchic and Mænadie, and stirs the blood in the true temper of the fine last lines of the words:

Strophe.—O thou, who art hailed by many a name, glory of the Theban nymph, and son of deeply-thundering Jove, who swayest renowned India, and presidest o'er the rites of Ceres, in the vales of Eleusis, open to all! O Bacchus, who dwellest in Thebe, the mother city of the Bacchanals, by the flowing streams of Ismenus, and the fields where the teeth of the fell dragon were sown.

Antistrophe.—Thee the smoke beheld as it burst into flame above the double-crested rock, where roam the Corycian nymphs, the votaries of Bacchus, and the fount of Castalia flows; and thee the ivy-crowned steep of the Nysian mountains, and the green shore, with its many clusters, triumphant send along, amid immortal words, that hymn thy "Evoc."

Strophe.—To reign the guardian of the streets of Thebe, whom you honor highest of all cities, with your mother that perished by the thunder. And now, since the city with all its people is enthralled by a violent disease, come with healing steps, over the slopes of Parnassus, or the resounding gulf of the sea.

Antistrophe.—O leader of the choir of flame-breathing stars, director of the voices that sound by night, youthful god, son of Jove, reveal thyself along with thy ministering Mænads, the Naxian maids, who maddened through the live-long night, celebrate thee with the dance, thee their lord Iacchus.

Beethoven's Music to Kotzebue's "Ruins of Athens."

We printed a year ago in full Mr. G. A. Macfarren's description of this work. In further illustration of the Cretan Concert of next Monday, we recall what he says of the three selections embraced in the second part of the programme, beginning with the simple, touching Duet: "No end to sorrow," &c.

It is the lament of two Greek slaves for the fallen condition of their native land, whose fertile soil they are compelled to cultivate, although they cannot enjoy its fruits. The rugged, broken character of the opening bars suggests the feeling of despair with which a sensitive heart must collapse within itself, at sight of the desecration of all that is most beautiful in art, of all that is most worshipful in nature, at the degradation of humanity itself, which, at the time of Kotzebue and Beethoven, polluted the ground where Socrates and Phidias taught their deathless lesson to the world. This subsides into an expression of plaintive sadness, conveyed in a long, continuous, well-developed, clearly defined melody, of most touching pathos. Every phrase of this exquisite little movement calls forth an exclamation of delight, and its general effect sinks deep in the memory to leave an impression there that accumulating experience cannot qualify, that time cannot efface. To single out a point for especial eulogy from a surface of even loveliness, is as if to signalize the bluest spot in the expanse of heaven; yet, should we know where those we love abide, that portion of the impenetrable azure which we believe to cover them, will surely be to us the brightest; and thus if some portion of a work of art appeal more particularly than the rest to our individual sympathy, such portion will ever be prominent in its effect upon our feelings, while our judgment pronounces the merit of the whole to be equal. Such prominence, to my personal rather than to my critical appreciation, has the beautiful cadence commencing from a chord of the fundamental seventh upon A, where the responsive sighing of the two voices indicates the expression which nothing could more perfectly, more touchingly embody than the passage before us. One naturally wonders how it can be that a piece so evidently written with the whole heart of the composer, and appealing direct from thence to the kindred feeling of all who hear it, should be so little known as still remains the Duet under notice; not to speak of the still-growing appreciation of the author; not to speak of the homage that is due to a great man of rendering the justice of our attention to all his works, to consider this Duet apart from Beethoven, and to regard it for its own particular merits alone, I cannot conceive why it is not in the possession of every one whose taste inclines to the higher, the intellectual style of music, and in constant requisition wherever such music is performed.

The following piece, the Chorus of Dervishes, is indeed better known; and its wonderfully graphic effect I believe widely appreciated. Here we have a party of the fanatic devotees of the Moslem faith chanting their wild song of adoration, accompanied with the frantic dance that is said to form a part of the ceremonial of their worship. Music presents nothing more strikingly characteristic than the uncouth melody that marks this truly extraordinary composition, and even this is more powerfully colored by the perfectly original and quite individual accompaniment that is maintained throughout.

The chant of the Dervishes consists of a most entirely singular melody, which is once repeated with the same words and then, after an equally individual symphony, that fully carries out the feeling of the vocal strain, resumed with some slight modifications to accommodate the extended metre of the verse, and prolonged with more than reduplicated power; and this second strophe, with the instrumental interlude, is also given twice,—then without coda and with only a few concluding bars, for the orchestra, the movement closes. The voices, tenors and basses only, sing in unison throughout, and the string instruments play ceaselessly in unison with them, save that in the accompaniment every crotchet is divided into a triplet of quavers, and there is no harmony throughout, in the interludial symphonies (wherein the only, and these though transient, very striking modulations from the original key of E minor occur) but only the peculiar counterpoint of the brass instruments, the limited scale of which necessitates the employment of the most strange and unusual combinations with the notes of the choral chant—hence arises a beauty out of the so-called imperfection of the natural capacity of the horn and trumpet, which the misnamed improvement of valves and keys, and piston, and what not, tend to annihilate, and thus to destroy all the individuality of character of those most prominent instruments, and so to nullify the very existence of orchestral coloring. The Chorus commences at a pianissimo, which gradually rises with the furious zeal of the singers to the utmost power of the voices and instruments, when, for the first time,—what—for the want of another technical definition—I have described as the counterpoint of the brass instruments, is introduced, and their fanatic fury reaches its climacteric, when on the high F the exclamation, "Great Prophet, hail!" is given with a preternatural ecstasy of fervor; the delirium that is here most forcibly depicted, gradually subsides, and the decrescendo that brings the movement to its conclusion, presents the exhaustion that is consequent upon such an exertion of all the mental and physical energies. Any, the greatest dramatic composer, might envy Beethoven such a subject for the exercise of one of his highest, most important qualities; but it is impossible to conceive the existence of such a genius as would not emulate in vain such a treatment of it as this, in which art supplants nature, or truth has so completely invested fiction with her own image, that we find the real and the ideal blent into one, and that one everything that can be imagined of perfection.

The Turkish March, that next follows, illustrates another phase of the oriental character with no less vivid picturesque and truly dramatic effect, than the preceding piece.

Bach's Works.

(From "JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH; his Life and Writings. Adapted from the German of C. L. HILGENFELD, with additions from other sources," as published in the London Choir.)

Bach's organ compositions are divided into two classes—viz., such as are directly intended for the service of the Church and accompany part of the liturgy; and such as have not this special aim, but are simply of a sacred character. In the latter, to which the great Preludes, Toccatas, Fantasias, and Fugues belong, the creative power of the composer exhibits its greatest brilliancy, especially in the Fugue. In this style of writing Bach excels all other organ composers beyond comparison. His fugues exhibit all the conditions of form, and are complete in æsthetic and technical respects. The theme is full of substance, and each passage, as it follows, stands out in correct proportion to it. There is an easy and flowing melody in all the parts, and at the same time the most perfect freedom and variety of expression.

Bach's vocal compositions are chiefly for the Church. The high earnestness and the solemn dignity of expression required for this class of music, responded best to his ideas of the destiny of the art. The principal form of vocal Church music in Bach's time was the Motet—viz., the construction of a choral melody in any given part, such as the tenor or cantus, round which the other parts moved in counterpoint and fugue.* Bach ennobled the stiff form of this composition, and wrote many motets for the choir of the St. Thomas School. All these compositions require large bodies of voices for their effective performance.

Bach greatly improved recitative, as well as the construction of the aria. He wrote his recitatives precisely as he wished them to be sung, and paid great attention to a correct declamation. The aria was thought little of in Germany in Bach's time. Being originally of Italian origin, following upon the "monody," it was wanting in characteristic formation, although Scarlatti, and before him Carissimi, Legrenzi, and Rovetta, had taken much pains to improve it at the end of the seventeenth century. It was reserved for Scarlatti's pupils, Leo, Durante, and other members of the Neapolitan school, to bring it to perfection. Bach, however, working independently, as usual, created a peculiar style of aria which forms the basis of Mozart's "concerto-aria" style.

We have yet to speak of Bach's merits in the improvement of melody, and certainly his efforts were not unattended with success. Melody was neither a mere addition to harmony, nor harmony a mere servant to melody; but both elements possess in his works a just share of attention. It has been already said that Bach was continually trying to develop the great riches of harmony, but always through the aid and assistance of melody. Hence his always melodious vocal strains—the genuine "polyphony," as it appears in all his works written after his thirty-fifth year. In general, Bach's melodies bear the character of the uncommon, even of the strange, as all that which arises from the creative power of a great genius deviates from the common. A great part of the impressive beauty of Bach's melodies is owing to his great power over rhythm. Here the taste of his time came to his aid. The rhythmic part of music was then far more cultivated than at the present time. There was even a species of composition, the chief peculiarity of which consisted in the striking change of rhythm. We mean the so-called "Suites," and afterwards (at a later date) the "Clavier Sonata." So, as in the region of harmony, it was in the formation of melody, Bach cut out his own path. Of course he owed the first impulse in the latter to the study of the French and Italian music, but the revolution, commenced in France and Italy, was seized by Bach with his strong hands and worked out independently of further aid. He followed his own ideas of the art, not caring for the opinions, nor for the transitory and superficial taste of the public. Forkel's remarks are very just:—"It is not a quality but rather a consequence of its qualities, that Bach's melody never grows old! It remains 'ever fair and young,' like Nature, from which it is derived. Everything that Bach mixed in his earlier works, conformably to the prevailing taste of his time, is now antiquated; but where, as in his later works, he has developed his melodies from the internal sources of the art itself, without any regard to the dictates of fashion, all is as fresh and as new as if it had been produced but yesterday. But very few compositions, equally old, will be found, of which anything similar can be said. Even the works of such ingenious composers as, for instance, Keiser and Handel have become antiquated sooner than might have been expected, and probably than the authors themselves believed.* As composers for the public in general, they were obliged to yield to the prevailing taste, and works of this kind last no longer than this taste. But nothing is more inconsistent and changeable than every description of popular taste, and in general whatever is called fashion."

* It has long been a disputed point as to what is the proper etymology of the word motet or motett. The usual derivation is from motus, movement; but long before the regular motet came into fashion there was a species of Church music in Biscant which was called mutetus. Each mutetus has its accompanying "tenor," usually with different words; the tenor being sometimes much shorter and probably repeated, to which the mutetus formed a counterpoint. It is pretty clear, then, that in this description of music we have the origin of the word motet, and also of tenor; the former being derived from mus, perhaps from the change in the words.

* This is true as regards Keiser, but only partly so as regards Handel. His operas are forgotten, but his oratorios will live for ever.

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 2.—Of the first Cecilia Concert only the programme is enclosed; your correspondent was not present.

"Spring's Welcome." Poem by E. Gelbel, Concerto for Chorus, op. 35. Gade.
Polonaise in E flat major, op. 22. Chopin.
Mr. G. Schneider.
Song for Bass. Ellson.
"Die Birken und Erlen." (Birches & Alders). Max Bruch.
Mrs. Kitchell and Chorus.
Concerto for Violin. DeBeriot.
Mr. Eich.
Miriam's Song of Triumph, for Solo and Chorus. Schubert.
Mrs. Kitchell and Chorus.

The second concert took place Jan. 24th, and was a musical success. There were two pieces, but lately published, which the society owes to your old correspondent, Mr. Garlicks, who brought them from Germany last fall.

"Die Birken und Erlen." Poem by Pfarrius. Composed for Solo and Chorus, Op. 8. Max Bruch.
Mrs. Bullet and Chorus.
Sonata in C minor for Piano and Violin. Beethoven.
Mr. H. Andres and Mr. Eich.
"Die Palmen von Bethlehem." (The palms of Bethlehem). Christmas song by E. Gelbel, for Solo and Chorus, Op. 8. H. Berthold.
Mrs. Bullet and Chorus.
Fantaisie Polonaise. Chopin.
Mr. F. Werner.
"Ein Schütz bin ich," from the "Nachtlager in Granada." C. Kreutzer.

Mr. Curth.
New Year's Song, by Fr. Rückert. For Solo & Chorus.
R. Schumann.
Mr. Garlicks and Chorus.

The second and third of the pieces for solo and chorus went admirably. The first, "The Birches and Alders," a fine lyric, was not quite true to pitch in some places. But the shading in all was beautiful. The composer of the second, Berthold, is a follower of Schumann; earnest as he ought to be, looking up to such a master, and original withal. It is op. 5, and we may excuse a few chromatic sequences of chords that do not sound beautiful. But there is a promise in this piece of future clearness of harmonic thought, of melodious beauty and of rhythmical inspiration, which makes us expectant for coming compositions by this master. The New Year's Song by Schumann has been mentioned in your Journal. We may say that the effect on us was even stronger than at hearing it before. Works of genius grow upon the hearer. The Chorale at the close was too fast. But otherwise Mr. Andres showed himself again the tasteful leader and musician he is. He was not ably seconded in the C-minor Sonata for Piano and Violin which he played with Mr. Eich. Without intending to judge of the gentleman named last after a first hearing, we yet feel compelled to say that true intonation ought to be learned long before appearing in public. The violin may have been a poor one, but the tone was screechy; and we hope to hear the gentleman to better advantage next time. Mr. Werner, on the contrary, played his Fantaisie Polonaise with artistic beauty. There was inspiration, there was contrast and, in most cases, clearness. The difficulties of the piece (and we remember very well from many private hearings at the rooms of friend L., how difficult it is) were not observable. Smooth, graceful or powerful, as the case might be, it went on "a thing of beauty and of joy." Mr. Curth sang: "Ein Schütz bin ich" from the Nachtlager, quite well. The Erk König was on the programme, however.

Following a time-honored German custom, the members of the Cecilia Society concluded the evening—indeed many went far into the next morning—with a dance, which was charming; at all events, "gemüthlich!"

On the evening of the 29th, Mr. L. C. Hopkins opened his new Music Hall by a private concert to invited guests, which is not a matter of public criticism; especially as your correspondent, though invited, was prevented from attending. To-day, the 30th, it was opened to the public by the first afternoon concert Cincinnati has enjoyed for years. Let us speak of the concert first.

Overture, from "Oberon".....Weber.
Third Symphony in E flat major.....Haydn.
Coronation March, from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer.
Quartet, for Piano, Cabinet Organ, Violin & Violoncello.
Geo. Schneider, H. J. Smith, H. Hahn, M. Brand.
Overture, "Semiramide".....Rossini.

The programme, as you see, was quite good. We missed the overture. The orchestra had three rehearsals, considering which we ought to be satisfied. It was a good beginning. There was no phrasing, however. The conductor, Mr. Barus, will undoubtedly take great pains to improve this most essential requisite of musical elocution. Of course he knows that a page of poetry or prose would sound quite unintelligible, if commas and so forth were not heeded. Now, that is just what his orchestra wants to heed when they play again. And to do this, the several gentlemen need only look at the slur in their parts, and to accent the first note slurred, playing the last soft and short, and the effect will be quite different. However, we do not wish to find fault to-day. It was a beginning. The quartet was not bad. Indeed the Cabinet Organ sounded quite well, bating the fact that crescendos and diminuendos were very much wanted. Mr. Schneider, of whom we hope to report many good things, had only a few chords to play. As to the hall we have to find fault. It is oppressively gaudy. Imagine a floor yellow with arm-chairs, a wall tolerably quiet, and a ceiling that comes down upon an unsuspicious visitor with the weight of strong blue, yellow and red colors, and you may know that the laws of decoration—artistic decoration we mean—have been put in the condition normal to Mr. Quilp's shop-boy. We are accustomed to neutral tints in ceilings; we can stand a rich tint in walls, but under such circumstances we expect a darker and richer floor than either. That looking-glass on either side of the orchestra is another one of the terrors. Just imagine some 60 or 80 gas-lights reflected in your very eyes. As for Mr. Hopkins, we cannot sufficiently express our gratitude for his public-spirited enterprise. One of the most successful merchants of Cincinnati, he has been active in the good cause of music for many years, because he loves it. As President of the Harmonic Society he has been liberal, beyond precedent; and now he has built this hall, which seems to open a new home to classical music. How well sometimes good mother Nature endows her children, so that they may not only be apt to acquire, but also to use well their wealth. We sincerely hope that the cultivated public of Cincinnati will second this fine undertaking by liberal attendance. We also hope, that these concerts may consist in future of two parts: one of lighter, and one of classical music; and in the interest of the good cause we would urge that light music form the second part. Many, who to-day were enchanted with the Coronation March, would want their seats and so hear both the classical symphony and the equally classical Strauss Waltz. For a wonder, the grand was by Chickering. Mr. Steinway's agent seems to be a good deal more enterprising than Mr. Chickering's.

Great things are in store for Cincinnati;—(which does not mean the opera at present performing Tro-vators, &c., but fine Chamber Concerts by Messrs. Kunkel and Hahn. We have seen the programme for the first, to come off Feb. 5th, and will only say, that it is most exquisite.

Private musical evenings have commenced again at the house of that patroness of musical art, Mrs. Rufus King. They of course are not subjects for criticism, but they are to be thankfully and gladly noticed, as promoting good taste and love for the beautiful. And as a proof that better things may be enjoyed there than the musical public of Cincinnati is favored with in concerts, let it be noted down here, that on the opening night, for the first time in Cincinnati, a song by Robert Franz was sung by one of the fair contributors to the enjoyment of the evening. We happen to know that it will not be the last one, and that even father Bach will consent to lend some of his best pieces to grace future occasions. The Kyrie a Capella by Robert Franz was performed Dec. 19th, 1865, by the Harmonic Society, but never had any of his songs been heard here.

The Männerchor announces one of its regular Opera Seasons, to begin Feb. 17th with a Sacred Concert, and to continue through the week, when we shall hear "Undine" and "Oberon." We shall have occasion to speak of the performances in our next.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 29.—In the midst of the turmoil of political strife we still give occasional attention to the harmony of sweet sounds, and what with Parepa and Brignoli, the Italian and English Opera, Davies' Philharmonic Concerts, Prume and Habelmann, the Peabody Musical Lectures, and the Baltimore String Quartet Soirées, we have enjoyed quite a musical season.

PRUME, the violinist, is accepted here as a performer of the very best ability, and he played upon an instrument of rare truth and sweetness of tone. HABELMANN, the tenor, you know, as well as we, to be possessed of a noble voice, and his numbers are always rendered with true expression and with a manner of modest refinement not often met with in public singers.

The Peabody concerts,—two by an orchestra made up of professional musicians, led by Mr. DEEMS, with explanatory words from Mr. SZEMEL-ENYI, and one by the Lenschow Amateur Orchestra, (a very creditable organization) proved exceedingly agreeable entertainments. The exact horoscope of the Musical Department of the Peabody Institute has not yet been cast. Its design is too vast and utopian for realization, and I think, if it will confine itself to the formation, from local material, of a tolerably complete orchestra, and build up a thoroughly complete musical library for use and reference, it will do all that can be reasonably expected of it.

I send the programme of the third concert of the Baltimore String Quartet Club, held in a small room, but yet too large for the select few who like classical music to fill. The Club comprises: GIBSON (1st violin), SCHAEFFER (2nd violin), LENSCHOW (viola), JUNGNIKKEL (violinello), and is now giving a course of twelve weekly concerts. Gibson is an amateur, engaged in mercantile pursuits, but possessed of remarkable talent, and a true appreciation of the best music, and by his example and active interest has done much to help us forward in the true faith. The others are well known as masters in their high calling.

Mozart's Quintet (C major), with Scheidler as 2d viola, was given with good feeling and expression, but I do not think it is one of his best, although the third movement is very beautiful. Beethoven's Quartet (E flat, op. 16) was superbly played, and is a most delicious composition. The pianist, Miss FALK, a recent importation, is winning golden opinions by her firm touch, clear execution and expressive shading. Haydn's Quartet (F major, op. 74) was well played, but is not particularly interesting.

The Baltimore Amateur Musical Association, which has endeavored during the past few years to centralize and make useful the undoubted vocal talent among our people, failed to raise its head this season, and the energy and good spirit of its esteemed originator and manager are unused, or expended on some other work.

Concerts.

ERNST PERABO's fourth "Schubert Matinée" (Jan. 31) was much the most interesting one of the series so far, and the most worthy of the name it bears, for two reasons. First, the music was all by Schubert.

Sonata (in C Minor). Dedicated to Robert Schumann....
Songs. {a. "Every soul at rest is sleeping".....
          {b. "Hark! hark! the lark".....
Rondo for four hands, (in D Minor), op. 84, No. 2.....
Song. "Barcarolle".....
Fantasia, four hands, (in F Minor). Op. 108.

Secondly, and of more account, the selections were more significant of Schubert's best power than any he had given us in the earlier concerts. The Sonata, especially, was for the first time one of the great ones. It appears in the collected piano works without opus number, as one of his "last compositions, finished the 26th of September, 1828." The "dedication to Schumann" it would be an anachronism to ascribe to Schubert himself; it was doubtless made later by the publisher,—a worthy compliment to the man who rescued the great Symphony in C from rubbish and oblivion. It is a sonata full of genius, sparkling with happy thoughts, solemnizing at times with calm and great thoughts, but oftener bearing you away on strong wing with resistless ardor. With the opening of the Adagio in A flat you begin to wonder if you are not with Beethoven, but the younger genius soon asserts his individuality. The Minuet and Trio, in which you seem smoothly, swiftly sailing through the air, catching but dreamy glimpses of the multifarious world below, was played, we thought, too fast, being marked only Allegro. The Finale, also Allegro, six-eight time with piquant accent,—that is, the main theme of the Rondo, for it has many curious, delightful episodes—went faster yet,—inconceivably fast we should say, if we had not actually heard it played so without the slightest scrambling, or unevenness, or indistinctness. It is a very long movement, and this perhaps justified the very rapid tempo in an artist who could play at that rate perfectly enough to make it seem quite natural to you despite the slower habit of your own pulse. It is a wonderful Finale and was wonderfully well played, as was indeed the whole Sonata. Finer pianism we have hardly had even from this young man, to whom execution is as easy as thinking or dreaming.

In the two four-hand pieces Mr. LANG played with Perabo; both very finely, although the two temperaments did not seem precisely matched in that sunshiny, graceful, even-running Rondo. The Fantasia proved one of the richest of the Schubert creations and was rendered to a charm.—The songs were sung by Miss CLARA M. LORING, a pupil of Mrs. Long, who more than confirmed the pleasant impression she made in one of Mr. Perabo's concerts last Spring, both as to pure, sweet, soulful quality of voice, good method, and chaste, refined expression. Seldom indeed, if ever, have we known so young a singer to seize so well the spirit of the Schubert songs; and here were three in marked contrast with each other. Mr. J. B. SHARLAND deserves credit for the accompaniments.

Mr. Perabo's fifth Matinée (next Thursday) will be a particularly rich one. Mr. DRESEL will play some Schubert Variations with him. For a Schubert Sonata, Perabo has chosen, what is equivalent to that, the Fantasia in G, in four movements, one of the noblest works. Besides this, the most difficult of all Beethoven's Sonatas, the great op. 106; and, with WULF FRIES, a Sonata Duo of Beethoven. Another young debutante will sing Cherubini's Ave Maria and Schubert's "Serenade."

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The fifth SYMPHONY CONCERT (Friday afternoon, Feb. 1) had the largest audience of the season, and one of the most attentive, sympathetic and well pleased. This was the programme:

Overture to "The Water-Carrier"..... Cherubini.
Piano-forte Concerto, op. 19, in B flat..... Beethoven.
First Symphony, in C minor, (op. 5)..... N. W. Gade.
Schubert's Fantasia, op. 15, arranged for Piano and Orchestra, by..... Liszt.
Overture to "Ruy Blas"..... Mendelssohn.

The Overtures were not new, and yet neither of them so familiar as they should be to our public. That by Cherubini to the Wasserträger (called in France Les deux Journées) is a very noble and a brilliant composition, a model in its kind, a far greater work than the two we had had by him already in this series. Yet it appeared to impress the audience less when it was revived for once last winter. This time we think it was more appreciated, although in silence for the most part. It was played with spirit and precision, and the grandeur of the deep bass passages in the opening Adagio was unmistakable, notwithstanding that unfortunately two of our six double-basses were absent. Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" made an excellent conclusion: it is a thoroughly dramatic overture, full of fire and contrast. The short-breathed staccato episode in the middle, and the very pronounced piece of cantabile for bassoon, could not fail to arrest attention; and the whole grows to an exciting climax. The orchestra did themselves great credit in it. So they did too in the Gade Symphony, whose wild northern sea-shore spirit, calling, like fairies: "Come unto these yellow sands" in the Scherzo, musing and sighing with deep, sweet-sad feeling in the Andantino (which means here quite a slow movement), roaring and storming like northern blasts mingling with old Vikingir battle songs in the Finale, took hold of the imagination with a sure grasp as usual.

But the feature of especial interest was Mr. B. J. LANG's playing of that early Concerto of Beethoven, one which is commonly supposed, and justly, not to take rank with the three greater Concertos which he composed afterwards (Nos. 3, 4, and 5, in C minor, G and E flat—all given in these Concerts last year), one probably never before played in this country and seldom brought forward by pianists anywhere. It pleased far more than was expected. To be sure, the first movement sounds a little commonplace and thin for Beethoven, but it is genial, graceful, happy, full of Mozart-like suggestions, like much of his earlier writing; and it is really marked with new importance by the masterly Cadenza by Moscheles, which so ingeniously sums up and intensifies its motives, and which Mr. Lang brought out in strong light to the best advantage. The Adagio, not one of its author's greatest, is full of beauty and true feeling; and as the rich theme grows it puts forth flowers and tendrils which the pianist finished off with fine felicity. But the Rondo finale, quaint and piquant, is full of vitality, and became electric under Lang's touch. This too is Mozart-ish; at times you seem to hear the gay Don Juan music; but the unmistakable Beethoven is never far off. Mr. Lang really surpassed himself in this performance, which was not only one of the neatest possible and most artistic pieces of pianism, but one of the most genial and intellectual interpretations of a master. In the Schubert Fantasia he had room for greater breadth and power; it is a broad, large work as Schubert wrote it for piano alone; especially the opening, and the introduction of the "Wanderer" melody in great, full chords, and the working up thereof, all of which Mr. Lang made most impressive. But Liszt has not only brought in the orchestral forces with it, but has much expanded and embellished the piano part, making it a very effective piece and of great difficulty. Sometimes the Liszt gets the better of the Schubert, and for a while rather bedevils the music, as in some of those tremolo transitions, which smell too strong of sulphur and Walpurgisnacht. But for the most part he has only set the work in the strong light which it requires, and his orchestra relieves a certain stiffness which we have always felt in the last Allegro, which begins fugue-like.

[We must not take leave of this Symphony Concert without turning back to correct the strange carelessness which led us last time to give Mr. Fries the praise of the violoncello obligato passage in the Romanza of the Schumann Symphony. We knew well enough that Fries that day was snowed up in the North, and that to Mr. A. SUEK belongs the credit of supplying his place so well.]

In the sixth concert (this week), CAMILLA URSO kindly comes to give us the Mendelssohn Concerto, which she was to have done on the 18th ult., had not the storm blocked her way. Mr. PARKER, as before arranged, supplies a Piano Concerto, by Hummel, in A minor. Consequently a short Symphony,—Mozart in D, commonly called the "French" one. Overtures to Fierabras, by Schubert, and the Egmont.

The Seventh Concert comes on March 1. Then both ROSA and MILLS will play; the former the Chaconne of Bach and the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto; the latter a Concerto by Liszt and Chopin's Scherzo in B minor, op. 20. Mrs. J. S. CARY will sing an Aria from Bach's Passion music, with violin obbligato by Rosa. The Symphony will be Beethoven's No. 8, and the only Overture that to Iphigenia by Gluck.

Mr. PARKER's VOCAL CLUB repeated their delightful concert to invited friends on the following Monday evening, Feb. 4. Fortunately for us, as it gives us opportunity to correct what we must have written in a strange state of unconsciousness, mechanically, with mind preoccupied by other topics crowding in and claiming also to be noticed. Verily in trying to get all in at such times, a poor editor may be writing of one thing, while thinking of another, as a musician reads a bar or two ahead of what his fingers are playing. Only so was it possible for us to ascribe Mrs. J. S. CARY's beautiful singing of the "Cradle Song" by Bach to another lady, whom to be sure we have hitherto associated much with Bach and with that song, but whose voice is not like the other's a contralto. Of course we knew that Mrs. Cary sang it, and were struck with its adaptation to her voice, and with the chaste, artistic style and the sincere expression with which she did it. The second time its beauty grew upon the listeners. To Mrs. HARWOOD belongs the praise, invariably hers, of singing the Franz songs, and whatever else she had to do, in a style to give the purest pleasure.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The third concert (Tuesday evening, Feb. 5) drew another crowded room-full at Chickering's. This was the musical matter:

Quintet in F. Op. 59.....Rubenstein
Lento ed Allegro non troppo—Allegro—Andante assai —Finale Allegro non troppo.
Concert Piece for Violin and Piano.....T. Ryan (Dedicated to Mr. Fries.)
Messrs. Fries and Perabo.
Tenth Quartet in E flat Op. 74.....Beethoven
Poco adagio ed allegro—Adagio—Presto—Allegretto con variazioni.
Piano Trio, in E flat Op. 100.....F. Schubert Allegro—Andante con moto—Scherzando—Finale allegro moderato.
Messrs. Perabo, Meisel and Fries.

The Rubinstein Quintet, played once last year by the Club, improved somewhat upon acquaintance. Portions of it are striking; but the work hardly seemed to us to justify a great fame. It is well however to know something of what the younger writers are doing. Mr. RYAN's Concert Piece is melodious, rather Italian in style, pleasing for a while but growing rather diffuse as it prolongs itself. The great Tenth Quartet by Beethoven takes a marvellous hold upon feeling and imagination. It has several times been played by the Club in past years, but we never so enjoyed it and were so spell-bound by it before. The more do we regret our inability, even if we had room, to make any sort of a description of it, and therefore we forbear. It was uncommonly well played, and we think it might advantageously occupy a place again in the next concert.

The splendid Schubert Trio, fraught with many delightful memories, told with more vivid eloquence than ever. For of course the piano part was rendered to the life by PERABO, and Messrs. MEISEL and FRIES entered equally into the spirit of it.

It was a delightful concert, and all must regret that only one more of the series remains, which, we are requested to say, will be given on the 19th, instead of the 5th, of March.

THE ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY assembled their friends, in overwhelming numbers, last Saturday evening, in the beautiful upper hall of the new Horticultural building. Naturally the three or four hundred "passive members" of the Club were more than singly, more than doubly, represented on such an occasion; there must have been some 1600 persons present, and a fine show it was of beauty and intelligence. By the return, with restored health, of Mr. KREISSMANN to his old post of conductor, the Orpheus feel at home again and seem to be animated with a new enthusiasm. The chorus numbered about forty voices, quite well balanced and well trained. For larger choruses they sang Schubert's 23d Psalm: "The Lord is my shepherd;" the Chorus of Priests from the Zauberflöte; a Chorus of Warriors (first time) from Ferd. Hiller's Oratorio "Jerusalem;" and finally the grand double chorus from Edipus by Mendelssohn, Mr. Leonhard accompanying on a Chickering Grand. For Part-songs, some Reiterlieder (Cavalry Songs) by Gade, and a Serenade by Marschner. Mr. KREISSMANN, whose voice never sounded more richly, warmly musical, sang Schumann's "Du meine Seele, O du mein Herz" (Dedication), putting the real fire into it, and with exquisite expression the "Frühlingsnacht." Verily we have no such interpreter of these choicest gems of German song. He also sang Schumann's Liebesgarten duet with Miss ADDIE RYAN, now his pupil, who has greatly improved in refinement of style and who surprised us by using the German language with such ease. She also sang alone two songs by Franz. "Wird er wohl noch meiner gedenken," and "Er ist gekommen" a good fiery counterpart to Schumann's "Widmung," in such a manner as to excite a very earnest recall.

Besides accompanying all this (except the part-songs) in right artistic-like manner, Mr. LEONHARD played Chopin's brilliant Scherzo in B minor (op. 20), and a lovely Cradle Song by Stephen Heller, admirably of course. There was also a fine Sonata-Duo of Beethoven, op. 30, No. 1, by Messrs. EICHBERG and LEONHARD. It was a capital concert; only the hall was over-crowded and hot, and so far as one could judge from that experience, not very favorable to sound.

On the same evening was a Complimentary Concert to Mr. J. L. HATTON, at Chickering's Hall, which we were unable to attend. But we were present in the spirit, and we desire to record our full sympathy with the compliment; for Mr. Hatton is one of the most complete musicians, best song writers, and most genial personages, that have ever figured in our musical world. He was an invaluable part of the late Bateman Concerts, and is associated with some of Boston's best musical doings seventeen years ago. We regret to lose him, but wish him a safe return to his English home and family, and long years yet of musical activities and joys. On this occasion Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS and Mr. P. H. POWERS sang for him, and, in the place of Sig. BRIGNOLI, Mr. WEILLI gave some of his brilliant pianism. For the rest, the programme was vocal, embracing several of Hatton's ballads and part-songs, some of the "little fat man's" funny things among them.

Mr. HERMANN DAUM was much more successful in his second "BEETHOVEN MATINEE" (Tuesday, Feb. 12). The audience was large, the day favorable, and the programme (all from Beethoven) excellent.

The Sonata with 'Cello was particularly enjoyable, full of felicities as it is, and nicely played. It consists of an Adagio, an Allegro molto quickening into Presto, and a Rondo Allegro—unlike the usual Sonata order. The Piano Sonata in D is one which we do not remember to have heard in public, though it is very familiar to students of Beethoven in private. We could wish the opening phrase, Presto, marked with clearer accent than Mr. Daum gave it; and indeed throughout the first and last movements a certain electric something was needed to point the phrases with more significance. The profoundly solemn and grand Largo made its impression well however. But the pianist showed to much the best advantage in the opening movement, the Scherzo, and the Adagio of the glorious Trio in B flat; for that he seemed to have reserved his energy; it flagged again somewhat in the Finale, like a spent swimmer; and indeed that is a task for a strong man. Mr. Daum is certainly a conscientious artist, and each trial of his wings shows progress.

Great interest was added to the concert by Mr. RUDOLPHSEN's singing of the three noblest of the six sacred songs which Beethoven set to words by Gellert. Many times we have suggested them to our public singers, but hitherto in vain. The impression they made this time will not be forgotten. The first two: "God, thy goodness," and "The Heavens are telling," are very simple, grand, religious strains, which, carried by so large a voice as Mr. Rudolphsen's and with such dignity and truth of style, were irresistible. The third, a Song of Repentance, is more elaborate, and much the most important of the six.

Musical Conservatories.

"BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC" is the name of a new music school on a large scale, which went into operation last Monday, after short notice, in the new white marble building upon Tremont Street, partly occupied by Messrs. Mason and Hamlin. Its founder and director is Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, which is in itself a good guaranty of thorough, scientific teaching and artistic tone and influence. Associated with him already he has Mr. KREISSMANN as director of the Vocal Department (German School), and Mr. HUGO LEONHARD as director of the Piano department. All three are experienced, high-toned artists, who have coöperated ere now. Mr. HOWARD M. DOW takes the beginners at the Piano, and Mr. SOLOX WILDER has charge of musical rudiments and reading at sight. Mr. EICHBERG himself teaches the Violin, as well as Harmony and Composition; Mr. A. SUEK, the Violoncello; Mr. JUNIUS HILL, the Cabinet Organ; Mr. ARBUCKLE, the Cornet; Mr. GOERING, the Flute; and other teachers will be provided for other instruments as the need may be.

The advantages of the Conservatory system, as here proposed, are mainly these:

1. Teaching by Classes, of four pupils in each case, and no more.
2. Cheap tuition. Indeed in many departments lessons are furnished, by good masters, at barely more than cost; so that there is all encouragement to talent with small means.
3. The chance to acquire musicianship, or at least a general knowledge of music as such, besides merely getting a little skill in singing or piano playing. Every pupil will attend the lessons in Theory, Harmony, &c., without additional charge.
4. The mutual inspiration which must spring up among a mass of students pursuing an artistic end together, in daily society of teachers who are artists, and with a pervading unitary tone and method. Under this head must be named the chances of hearing good music, and even of partaking in it, the social Chamber concerts, &c., which will naturally spring up.
5. The nursery it may be for raising up players of instruments for our orchestras. Already we are glad to learn that the Conservatory has a dozen Violin pupils, beginners and even a class of older violinists, some of whom have played in orchestras, who come here to reform their habits of bowing, &c.

More advantages will readily suggest themselves. We have visited the rooms, five in number, fronting the Common, commanding an inspiring view, and furnished with simple, tasteful elegance. Already 130 pupils have entered their names.

Scarcely was the above announced, when by a sudden coup d'etat a "NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY" dropped down from the clouds, captured the Music Hall, flooded Boston with grandiloquent Circulars, created "Professors" by the score, and, gathering up pupils fast, is ready to open next Monday. It is under the direction of Mr. EBEN TOURJEE from Providence, and Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK from New York. Perhaps the more the merrier. But we must pause, observe and think.

CROWDED OUT: Letters from New Haven, and elsewhere; hints of good things coming, and a great deal more.

NEW YORK. German Opera appears to be "re-constructed" under its old impresario, Mr. GROVER. The singers, tired of divisions and of experiments in little squads upon their own account, have rallied around Grover again, showing a disposition to be tractable. Grover has taken the Olympic theatre, where, besides the artists who have lately been singing at the Thalia (Mlle. Naddi, Wm. Formes, &c.), he has again about him Johannsen, Frederici, Rotter, Himmer, Herimanns, &c., making together a really stronger company than that which made so good a beginning two or three years ago. The repertoire, too, bids fair to be fine, judging from this paragraph in a late number of the Evening Post:

Last night Mozart's "Magic Flute" was given at the Olympic. Mlle. Naddi, the prima donna of the French operatic company, achieved a decided success. Wilhelm Formes and Mme. Rotter sustained handsomely the parts of Papageno and Papagena. This evening we are to have the "Marriage of Figaro," on Friday evening the only repetition of "William Tell," and on Saturday afternoon, at a matinée, "Martha."

MARETZEK is to open the rebuilt Academy of Music early next month with a grand advertising flourish in the shape of a bal d'opera. Among the operas to lead off are mentioned the "Prophet," L'Africaine, and Petrella's Carnevale di Venezia. Cagnoni's Don Bucefalo is laid aside for the present. Miss Kellogg is to appear in a new role for her, La Traviata.

As for the French Opera, its members have mostly returned to France, finding no better end of troubles. The Weekly Review says:

French opera is no longer in existence, although the effort to revive it in the shape of "Orphée aux Enfers," which was made a week ago, may be called pretty successful, the cast being, in some respects, better than before, and there being even a sprinkling of clouds in the second act, which is played in Olymp. At the first performance the Olymp consisted of a common drawing-room. The opera was pretty well given, with the exception of the music, which seemed to be regarded as a secondary matter. There is no prospect of another revival of opera at the French opera-house.

A new Italian Opera enterprise is in the field, of which last Saturday's Weekly Review thus pleasantly advises us:

Signor Mora is quite a young man, who feels it to be his mission to give to the public the genuine article of Italian opera, in a style worthy of the great maestros of his country. Signor Mora, we believe, is the organist of Zion Church, and an industrious composer. Sixteen operas which he has written have been hitherto lost to the admiration of the world; and numberless Oratorios, Masses, and Motets will be discovered among the valuable worldly goods which Signor Mora will bequeath to his heirs. Signor Mora is supported by some gentlemen whose keen perception has convinced them that the young Italian is the coming man, and, in fact, the only one to bring back the old and glorious times of Italian opera, and they have therefore put at the disposition of the neophyte impresario the modest sum of from one and a half to four million dollars. We confess that we should hesitate to believe that there are such magnanimous people in existence in times like the present, when money is rather scarce, but since Signor Mora himself is the source of our information, we must put aside our surprise and be solely delighted.

The season will be commenced at the French Theatre, and be continued, if the vast sum of money is not expended before, during three or four months. The artists whom Signor Mora has been so fortunate as to engage are almost all without exception well known in New York. They are Miss Phillips, Signor Ifre, Signor Fortuna, and Signor Milleri, besides the prima donna, Sgra. Giuditta Altieri, a lady of whom we had occasion to speak favorably some weeks ago.

Sgra. Altieri is the wife of Mr. Oscar Pfeiffer, and arrived in this city, from Rio Janeiro, some six weeks since. She was educated in Milan, and has enjoyed a very good name as an artist both in Italy and South America. The public of Rio Janeiro is a very critical one, and it is not easy there to make a great hit. Sgra. Altieri, however, seems to have accomplished this feat, if we may trust the various news-papers of Rio Janeiro, which speak in glowing terms of the young lady's performances. She is certainly very pretty, highly intelligent, and possesses great dramatic talent. She will make her debut in "La Traviata," which is said to be one of her best parts. We sincerely hope, in the interest of all concerned in this enterprise, that the old saying, "Periculum in Mora," will not prove true this time.

The PAREPA Concerts, under Mr. Harrison's management, seem to be very successful. We read of audiences of from 2,000 to 3,500 persons. A "Wallace night" was the feature of last week, when the programme was wholly made up from that lamented composer's works. A Mendelssohn and a Mozart night, a Beethoven and a Weber night, are expected to follow. Carl Rosa and Mills, as well as Parepa, are continual themes of praise among the critics. It said that Mr. Harrison, among his multifarious plans, will give, with the aid of Mme. Parepa, and of the Cecilian Choir and the Harmonic Society, under the direction of F. L. Ritter, the oratorios of the "Messiah," "Samson," Judas Maccabæus" and "Elijah."

FARMINGTON, CONN.—As regularly as the season, come to us the annual pair of programmes of classical chamber music given at Miss Porter's young Ladies' School, where Mr. CARL KLAUSER is musical director, by artists from New York or other cities. These now before us, of Feb. 8th and 9th, are up to the high standard which has prevailed there for years. The artists were Messrs. MASON, THOMAS and BERGNER (piano, violin and 'cello), who performed, on Friday: Beethoven's E-flat Trio, Op. 1, No. 1; a Salon-piece for Violin by Spohr; Lieder ohne Worte by Mendelssohn; Schubert's E-flat Trio, op. 100. On Saturday: Trio in B flat by Beethoven—not the great one, but the op. 11, containing the variations on an Italian air; Andante from Mendelssohn's 'Cello Sonata in B flat; piano pieces (Phantasie-Stücke and Noveletten) by Schumann; Trio in C minor, op. 103, by Raff.

ST. LOUIS.—The third Philharmonic Concert, Jan. 31, A. WALDAUER Conductor, offered the following selections: Overture to "Tell;" Sanctus and Benedictus (solo and chorus) from Weber's Mass in E-flat; Sextuor by Onslow, op. 77, for piano, flute, clarinet, horn, 'cello and doublebass; two four-part songs by Mendelssohn;—Andante and Minuet from Schubert's Symphony in C; Quartet for male voices: "Good night," by Hatton; Polonaise from Meyerbeer's Struensee; Scena and chorus from Semiramide.

HOW BEETHOVEN SAVED A MUSICAL DIRECTOR FROM IMPRISONMENT.—For some reason best known to themselves, the Hanoverians, since the military occupation, call their new countrymen, the Prussians, by the euphonious name of Cuckoo. At a concert at the "Hof Theater" the Pastoral was performed. The Baroness Voigt-Rheetz, wife of the Prussian military governor, and suite were present. When the clarionets in the Scene by the Brook uttered those two disloyal tones d-b-flat, and even reiterated them, the Baroness indignantly rose and left with her train. The next morning our unlucky director was called before the military tribunal and accused of wilful disloyalty to the ruling power. Fortunately for him, he could prove by the score, that those disagreeable cuckoo-calls had been put in the original some time before the Hanoverians became Prussians, and he was saved.

The words are by Harriet Prescott, whose quaint lines are very pleasing. The one who went out "gathering pansies" on a "summer even," was well employed, as was the serenader who gazed on the sparkling stars.
- O father, dear father, come down with the stamps. Song. Wilder. 30
This composer gets "Wilder" and "Wilder" in his comicallities. To see the point of this joke, "come down with the stamps" and buy the song.
- The murmuring sea. Song. W. Ganz. 40
- I seek for thee in every flower. " 30
Two songs such as Parepa sings with so much success. Pretty easy, and effective.
- I have kissed thee in my dreams. Ballad. L. W. Wheeler. 30 Beautiful melody, and in good taste throughout.

Instrumental.

- Young Maennerchor's Grand March. Mueller. 35
Powerful and brilliant, and the "Young Men's Choir" will no doubt step out to the music with a deal of satisfaction.
- Bolero, d' apres Victor Masse, for piano. W. Kuhe. 75
- La Pensée. Galop brilliant. F. Guzman. 60
Although by different authors, these two may be classed together as being brilliant and effective pieces, founded on "dance music," and of some little difficulty.
- Pot Pourri. "Crispino e la Comare." H. Cramer. 75
Poor Crispino has fallen into a Pot Pourri, it seems, and one presided over by a most vigorous "stirrer." Bad for him, but well for us, since here is a compound of an unusual number of good melodies, which are skillfully united.
- Polly Perkins Quadrilles. C. Coote. 75
"As beautiful as a butterfly," throughout, with well-known and favorite melodies.
- Finlander's Dance. "Shells of Ocean." E. Mack. 30
A very peculiar tune, easy and useful.
- Mynheer van Dunk. B. Richards. 50
Also, quite peculiar, but good, and brings the freshness of a new sensation to those who play it.
- Wiener Bon-bons Waltzes. J. Strauss. 75
- Up and Down Galop. C. Faust. 35
Faust galops us over the hills and dales very merrily to Vienna, where Strauss serves up his Bon-bons with brilliant waltz accompaniment.
- Muriel Valse. Tinney. 40
Has unusual depth and richness, with sufficient brilliancy.

Mr. John Hullah on Musical History.*

Amid all the talking which has taken place during the last two years with reference to musical education, the want of good text books, both for teachers and scholars has been to a great extent overlooked, and we believe that one of the first tasks which will have to be performed by the new heads of the Royal Academy of Music, will be the preparation of some works of this nature. It is true, that by the publication of English translations of some of the best foreign treatises on musical science, Messrs. Novello have done much in this way; but still more remains to be accomplished before music will, in this respect, be in a position at all equal to that enjoyed by almost every other branch of literature, science and art.

In its history especially is there a lack of works which can be confidently recommended to the student, and, as to a biographical dictionary of musicians, there is absolutely not one in our language on which the slightest dependence can be placed. True it is that, in these days, nearly every one can read French as well as English, and, therefore that the dictionary of M. Fétis is available for all practical purposes; but even this, as far as regards our own countrymen, is so incomplete as to detract very greatly from its value; and, therefore, although it is better than any other within our reach, yet it by no means removes the necessity for a complete English work. So far as the history of the art goes, Mr. Hullah has done much to clear the way for future writers by the publication of two series of lectures delivered by him at the Royal Institution, and these volumes furnish the most valuable records which the student can at present add to his library—in fact, no one who really wishes to be acquainted with the chief styles which have gradually grown out of each other during the last fifteen hundred years, and with the leading musical spirits of each successive age, should be without them. At the same time that they are sufficiently abstruse to be of real value as sign-posts on the road leading to still deeper research, they are also written in such a pleasant, readable way that the amateur, or even the casual reader may take them up without any fear of being frightened by scientific expressions or mere empty formulas.

Before proceeding to notice the works themselves it may not be uninteresting to our readers to give a short notice of their author, who now holds the responsible posts of Professor of Vocal Music at King's College, London, and Organist to the Charter house. This we cannot do in a more concise way than by reprinting a short sketch which appeared in one of the well-written Entr'actes in the concert books of the Islington Vocal Union, to which we have frequently directed our readers' attention:—

"John Hullah was born in 1812. Since childhood his life has been spent in London. His musical education was slight and desultory until he was seventeen, when he received regular instruction from Mr. Horsley, whose pupil he remained for three years, and then entered the Royal Academy of Music. He first became known to the public as a composer in 1836, writing in conjunction with Mr. Charles Dickens the comic opera of The Village Coquettes, which was produced at the St. James's Theatre, and played upwards of fifty times during the season. In 1837 he composed The Barbers of Bassora (written by Mr. Morton), and in 1838 The Outpost (written by Mr. Serle)—both produced at Covent Garden, then under the management of Mr. Macrea-

dy. At this time Mr. Hullah's attention was turned from dramatic compositions to the pursuit in which he has so highly distinguished himself. He was led to contemplate the possibility of the formation of popular singing classes; and after several visits to Paris, devoted to the examination and adaptation to English use of the celebrated system of Wilhem, he, in 1840, under the sanction of the Committee of Council on Education, founded schools in London on the principles of that system, which, in his hands, proved to be most effective. The rapid growth of these schools, and their immense influence in spreading the love and knowledge of music throughout this country, are matter of history. It is proper to mention that although Mr. Hullah, in the establishment of his schools, received great assistance from high officials in connection with the Committee of the Privy Council, the Government never contributed any pecuniary aid to their support. The schools were at first held at the Apollonicon Rooms, St. Martin's Lane, and afterwards at Exeter Hall; but the heavy rent and other expenses having rendered it necessary to resort to a less convenient locality, Mr. Hullah conceived the design of erecting a building for the special accommodation of his classes. By his own exertions, and from his own resources, he built St. Martin's Hall, a spacious and useful edifice in Long Acre; the foundation stone was laid in June, 1847, and the whole was completed in December 1850. From that time until 1859, when the hall was destroyed by fire, about twelve public concerts were given there annually, without interruption; the instrumental orchestra consisting of professional performers, and the chorus exclusively of amateurs, all his own pupils. These concerts were of the highest order, and warmly supported by the public, the interpretation of the great oratorios and other orchestral works leaving little to be desired. Shortly after the destruction of the Hall, a handsome testimonial was presented to Mr. Hullah, since which time he has retired into private life. His retirement may be considered in the light of a great public loss. It is estimated that he personally taught in his schools about 15,000 persons; but all these form a mere fraction of the numbers taught on his system in schools throughout the United Kingdom."

For the first series of lectures, delivered in the early part of the year 1861, Mr. Hullah took as his definite subject the "History of Modern Music;" but in order to give his readers some distinct idea of the connecting links which bind past and present together, he briefly sketched the history of the art from its earliest ages. And in doing the primary part of his work in a short and succinct way, he showed great wisdom; for the past of music, unlike that of the sister arts of Painting and Sculpture is, when compared with its mighty present, absolutely nothing; and therefore the more commendable the brevity with which it is passed over. In the old monuments of Nineveh, the catacombs of Rome, the palaces of Thebes, there is a lesson to be learnt of progress, which is of the greatest value to the student. So again, in the picture galleries of the continental towns, and in our own national collection in Trafalgar Square, we may look upon the works of the great masters with reverence, feeling that their grandeur is almost unapproachable, that their loveliness can never fade—in fact, that, as far as things earthly can be, they are immortal; but when we turn to the art of sweet sounds the case is reversed, and we cannot look back farther than Mozart and Beethoven for anything like perfection in form, inasmuch as the glories even of Haydn and Handel were those of the morning stars proclaiming the coming dawn, though so bright and glorious that they almost outshone the works of their more perfect successors.

But to have devoted many hours to the discussion of the early days of musical history would have been almost a waste of time, as so little is really known with reference to it, and that little is so involved in obscurity, that the sooner it is passed over the better; for Mr. Hullah truly says that "we shall find little demanding precise presentation before the eleventh century, and little in the way of art, as we understand it, before the fifteenth century." He accordingly divides the history of modern music into four periods, which he describes as follows:—The first, as a period of preparation the beginning of which it would be somewhat difficult to define, but which ended about the year 1400; the second, as that of the old tonality, and of (to us) the old masters, extending from 1400 to 1600; the third, a transition period from the second to the fourth, from 1600 to 1750; and the fourth, that of the modern tonality and the modern school in which we are now living. These divisions serve to assist the memory of the reader in assigning to each period its chief features and its chief examples, and although it is, of course, merely an arbitrary arrangement, yet there can be little question that it is a wise one.

Mr. Hullah looks upon Religion as the Mother of Music—in fact, he goes so far as to say that, "but for the universal instinct which suggests song as a means of expression of prayer and praise, music might have gone out of the world altogether." He tells us, too, that congregational singing "was one of the difficulties of church musicians even in the early ages, and that at the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 315) the laity were absolutely forbidden to sing in church at all, as the only means of securing decency and order in public worship."

Passing over the names of St. Ambrose and St. Gregory, whose history is doubtless well-known to our readers, we find an interesting account of a contemporary of the latter, named Isidore, Archbishop of Seville, in whose treatise (Sententie de Musica) there is "the earliest mention yet discovered of harmony in the modern acceptation of the term, the simultaneous utterance of different sounds. Isidore speaks of two kinds of harmony—symphony and diaphany; by the former of which he would seem to have meant a combination of consonant, and by the latter, of dissonant, intervals." To the North of Europe he gives the credit of having been the source of this harmony, and of instruments "capable of producing, and, indeed, hardly to be used without producing different sounds at the same instant of time."

Guido Aretino is the next notable man in the first period. He was a resident at the Benedictine monastery of Pomposa, between Ferrara and Ravenna, in the eleventh century. To him is universally accorded the first use of the hexachord, or scale of six sounds—a system suggested by the hymn to St. John the Baptist, which has the peculiarity that the first syllable of each line is sung to a note one degree higher than the preceding. Of the melodies of these olden times Mr. Hullah gives the following sketch:—"There existed in the middle ages a species of melody which was absolutely timeless; and, up to a somewhat late period, no other was heard or practised in the Church. Of such melody a great deal has come down to us in the service books of the Latin Church; and the attention of every traveller who has ever entered a continental church will have been occasionally called to certain strains coarsely uttered, perhaps,—strange, dull, uncouth sort of stuff, if you will—but which, being altogether unlike anything ever heard outside the church walls, does, in spite of ourselves, and in spite of the way in which it is performed, force itself on our attention and extort a kind of respect. Of such melody a great deal has come down to us on paper, or, rather, parchment; but it seems to be admitted, among those who have studied it most closely, that the performance of it is a lost art. Great efforts have been made of late years, especially in France, to recover it; but they have not been attended with much success. Its very existence would seem to be incompatible with that of the cantus mensuralis. The printing-press has destroyed mediæval sculpture, in rendering it useless; the time-table has destroyed mediæval plain song, in rendering it impracticable."

In the Second Period of his sketch of the History of Modern Music, our author takes us over a space of two hundred years, from about A.D. 1400 to A.D. 1600, although he occupies some pages in a re-survey of the state of music in the twelfth century to prepare the reader to take up the thread of the story at the commencement of the fourteenth. The result of musical education in the twelfth century, so far as its scientific terms and rules, or what Mr. Hullah calls its apparatus, were concerned, he sums up in the following language:—

"Descent, though of a somewhat rude kind, was extensively practised; the two principles on which our modern notation is based—that the place of a note determines its pitch, and the shape its length—were recognized; and means were presented in the fiat and the shorp of expressing every recognized variety of musical intonation. Much of this apparatus was too delicate for any hands into which, at this time, it could possibly fall; the majority of musicians did not at first attempt to avail themselves of it. Diaphany, the accompaniment of plain-song with consecutive octaves, fifths, and fourths—had died out in some places; but fixæ boundon (a somewhat improved variety of it) and extemporaneous descent were the nearest approach to music made, even in the Pope's Chapel, by the best singers, up to the time of the removal of the Papal Court to Rome, in the year 1377."

In the latter part of this century we hear of Adam de la Hale, the reputed composer of the first comic opera, entitled Le jeu de Robin et de Marion, the well-worn theme of Robin Hood and Maid Marian, which still inspires the poet, the painter, and the musician. We must refer our readers to the excellent musical illustrations in Mr. Hullah's volume for a specimen of this ancient music taken from a perfect transcript of the original libretto; one melody given is especially worthy of notice. In the fourteenth century advance is made to counterpoint, which, as our readers probably know, is a term derived from the Latin contrapunctum, i.e., point against point, which gradually usurped the place of the term descent in the writings of scientific musicians. This century, too, was remarkable for the first music in four parts, which occurs in a mass performed in 1360 at the coronation of Charles V. of France.

Mr. Hullah gives to the Netherlands the credit of having given birth to the first union between the theory and practice of music—between those who wrote from instinct and those who had worked the system of composition into a series of laws. Several of these Belgian musicians visited Rome in the latter part of this fourteenth century, taking with them the first masses ever seen written in counterpoint. Chief among these men was William Dufay, whose works are noticeable as presenting the first example yet discovered of imitation, a species of canon which Mr. Hullah describes in that plain and easy manner which make his works valuable even to the uninitiated:

"One of the most valuable resources of musical science is canon. Canon, I need hardly say, means simply rule; and musicians have at different epochs subjected themselves to rules, many of which are doubtless pedantic and absurd enough. But that particular kind of canon which is called imitation has long been, and always will be, an integral part of every sustained musical composition of a high class. Musical composition does not consist in an unintermittent presentation of new thoughts, but in the development, the pursuit to their ultimate consequences of a few thoughts—sometimes even of a single one; technically, in making the same passage heard suc-cussively in various scales, in various parts, and under various forms of accompaniment."

The next great name in the musical roll of the Second Period is Josquin Deprez, or Del Prato as he has been christened by his Italian admirers, who even go so far as to claim him as a native of Prato near Florence. The place and date of his birth are equally uncertain, but he was a singer in the Pope's Chapel in 1484, and therefore Mr. Hullah thinks his birth may safely be assigned to some period before 1460. He did not remain long in Rome, but, after a sojourn at the court of the Duke of Ferrara, went to reside at Paris at the court of Louis XII. This monarch, like our own bluff King Hal of polygamic memory, had a taste for the music art, though by no means such a good knowledge of it, as is proved by the following amusing anecdote:—

"The king, though fond of music, had never studied it. Not only so, his natural aptitude for the art was of the very least. In plain terms, his Majesty had a very bad voice, and sang habitually out of tune. Fortunately for those of his subjects whose privilege it was to be immediately about him, he was quite aware of his own infirmity. One day, however, the whim seized him to commission Josquin to write something in which he himself could take part. Josquin met the difficulty in the most ingenious manner. He constructed a quartet, the two upper parts of which formed a canon in unison to which he added a free bass; the fourth part, the vox regis, as he somewhat saucily called it, being confined to one single note, which it was the business of the king to reiterate, almost incessantly, throughout the piece."

Not only, however, on account of his pleasant manners and ready wit, of which Mr. Hullah gives other amusing instances, but from the skill he possessed in musical composition, he became more popular than any of his contemporaries. Luther tersely said of him: "Other musicians do what they can with notes, Josquin does what he likes with them." And yet how little his name is now known, and that only to the student; but as a proof of what we owe to Belgian influence we need no brighter example.

Turning to Italy, we have the story of the origin of our modern oratorio, which Mr. Hullah borrows from Crescimbeni's "Storia della Volgar Poesia," vol. 1., book 4:—

"The Oratorio, a poetical composition, formerly a commixture of the dramatic and narrative styles, but now entirely a musical drama, had its origin from San Filippo Neri, who, in his chapel, after sermons and other devotions, in order to allure young people to pious offices, and detain them from earthly pleasures, had hymns, psalms, and such like prayers sung by one or more voices. Among these spiritual songs were dialogues; and these entertainments, becoming more frequent and improving every year, were the occasion, that, in the seventeenth century, oratorios were invented, so called from their origin. The society formed by Filippo (in 1540) was called 'La Congregazione dei Padri dell' Oratorio'—from orare to pray. The form of composition therefore, takes its name eventually from the pious exercise which brought San Filippo and his disciples together; and immediately, from the place in which they were carried on."

Passing over Claude Goudimel, who opened the first music school ever established in Rome, and who was the arranger of the music to the metrical psalms of Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, we pass on to his pupil Palestrina, to whom Mr. Hullah gives the title of "Princeps Musicae"—the type and glory of the Second Period. His real name was Giovanni Pierluigi, the name of his birthplace having swallowed up his patronymic. He was born at Palestrina, near Rome, in 1524, and in 1540 entered Claude Goudimel's school at Rome. In 1551, when at the age of twenty-seven, he was appointed chapel-master of the Vatican Basilica, and after the publication of his first work was chosen as one of the singers in the Pope's Chapel, and subsequently was appointed choir-master of S. John Lateran, and, later still, of the oratory of San Filippo Neri. His position and relative greatness in comparison with his contemporaries Mr. Hullah thus describes:—"Josquin Deprez had found musical science and musical art almost strangers to each other. He made them acquainted; Palestrina made them one."

The introduction of secular into ecclesiastical music was even in those days one of the chief drawbacks to the progress of Church music, which called forth the well-deserved censure of the committee appointed by the Council of Trent to inquire into the matter, whose first act was to "forbid the performance of any mass or motet of which profane words formed an integral part; and, secondly, to banish equally from the service of the Church all music built on secular themes." To Palestrina was intrusted the work of raising the Church music from the low state into which it had fallen of that day; indeed, he may be regarded as its saviour. His Missæ Pape Marcelli still stands out as one of the greatest works of its class. Still, great as was his genius, and earnest his labor, he never attained either competence or the fame which he deserved, and even the good which he did has lived after him in almost every other country to a greater extent than in his own.

This was an age, too, of madrigals and part-music. The madrigal, which we have got into the habit of associating almost exclusively with the names of our great English composers, was at first essentially Italian, Luca Marenzio being one of its chief masters, although the fame of his writings in his native land has been forgotten amid the less worthy compositions of modern times. But out of the ruins of the musical greatness of continental countries at the close of the sixteenth century, we find our own land rising up in all its native and original power, as the keeper of the sacred art, and England, hitherto behind the rest of the world, came forward to the front with its noble school of writers of vocal part-music, which was, of course, the chief form of composition in those days; instrumental music, as a separate branch of art, having little or no real existence. At this point we leave Mr. Hullah with the close of his Second Period.

Abert's "Astorga."

Astorga: a Romantic Opera, in Three Acts, &c.—[Astorga, Romantische Oper, in drei Akten. Text von E. Pasquo; Musik von J. J. Abert] (Leipzig, Breitkopf & Härtel; London, Ewer & Co.)

There is a fate in certain stories. It might have been fancied that the history of Stradella, the singer whose voice performed a miracle analogous to that of "Orpheus's Lute," and who saved his own life from the daggers of hired assassins, offered a first-rate canvas for an opera composer. Yet, though it was treated with skill and elegance by Niedermeyer for the Grand Opera of Paris (the romance, "Venise est en core au Bal" being one of the most charming which could be named), that opera—effaced, it may be, by the brilliancy of Meyerbeer's popularity, sustained by incessant efforts, to which it is no scandal to refer—died without making any mark. M. von Flotow's "Stradella" would, probably, by many, be cited in disproof of our assertion. That opera, it is true, has gone everywhere in Germany, and been the delight of commercial travellers and vacant military men, with whom it has passed for something bright, Southern, and picturesque. Neither in France, in England nor in Italy has this reputation been accepted. More vapid, puerile, and paltry music does not keep the stage anywhere. Compare this "Stradella," for instance, with the light-hearted opera music of old Dittersdorf, or set it by the side of one of poor Lortzing's best scores, and its meagreness and frivolity will stand confessed. It is in the acceptance of such trash that the admirers of Herr Wagner find some excuse for their belief in his ravings; and not without plausibility, till it is recollected that there has never been any want in the world of such a commodity as "clotted nonsense." The above outline is not thrown off at random, to point a paragraph, so much as to establish two distinctions: the first, that certain stories exist which tempt the musician while they do not repay his labor; the second, that a want of something which shall "keep the balance true" betwixt the speech of the unknown tongues and such appeal to coarse persons as befits the race of Theraps, distinguished from real artists, has been, is, increasingly making itself felt in the opera-houses of Germany. By meeting this want—the third opera of an earnest and accomplished artificer, such as Herr Abert is known to be—founded on a musical legend less simple and winning than the story of "Stradella," has taken, it seems, something like a solid hold on popular sym-pathics. There are no tricks in it played off to entrap popularity. It contains clear, honest music, as we understand the meaning of these epithets,—on the strength of which its composer may be rated higher than Marschner (because he was worth little when not parroting Weber's most obvious effects).—than Lindpaintner, whose "Lichtenstein" (composed also for Stuttgart) is distinctly present to memory as we write,—than Herr Lachner, whose "Catarina Cornaro," howbeit conscientiously wrought, has in no respect eclipsed or put out of court Halévy's "La Reine de Chypre,"—which, by the way, was in no respect Halévy's best serious opera. As a last illustration of our opinion of its value, we place "Astorga" higher than the "Loreley" of Herr Bruch, the only other rational modern opera which may be said to have created some sensation in Germany.

We are not yet in case to speak of the effect of the music of "Astorga" on the stage, or with an orchestra; so shall reserve criticism on these points till a future day. We know, however, by the "Columbus" Symphony that Herr Abert manages his instruments with taste and experience. His melodies, if not the freshest of the fresh, are pleasing, and calculated to display the voices advantageously. His concerted pieces are solidly knit,—the final scene, in which a phrase of Astorga's "Stabat" is used, expressly claiming notice. There is some lively ballet-music. To conclude for the present: we have little doubt that the good reception which has greeted "Astorga" wherever it has been heard will have a quickening effect on its composer's invention when he shall write his next opera. Individuality of style is not always reached at a bound; and there is no branch of musical effort in which incessant practice is so necessary as in composing for the stage. Once more, we cannot but congratulate the composer and his country on a success which, in some degree, may be said to mark a return to sanity.

Bach's Works.

Like all great masters, Bach did not arrive at perfection in his art all at once. On the contrary, he proceeded even slower than many other great geniuses. But if he proceeded slowly in working out his wondrous ideas, his progress was sure. He was in his fortieth year before he may be said to have arrived at perfection. His studies, as we have seen, commenced in his earliest youth, and the formation of his style is due chiefly to his knowledge of the works of Frescobaldi,* Froberger,† and Pachelbel.‡

He also gave his attention to the organ and clavier, as these instruments existed in France, and were beginning to create some sensation in Germany. But he did not stop here. Italy, as we have stated, had the reputation of being the music-school of Europe. The melodious element was making great way there, especially in the works of Scarlatti—the founder of the Neapolitan school—as great in the invention of the charming cantilena as in expressive recitative; also a wondrous master of counterpoint. Bach was not able to proceed to Italy—perhaps this was favorable to his artistic originality; but he studied the music of the Italians, especially the works of instrumental composers. Amongst the latter those of Vivaldi, who enraptured the German artists by his lively violin solos and quartets for stringed instruments.‡ Thus Bach's studies were far from being one-sided.

Bach was always occupied. In his more mature age he even made the night serviceable to him by practising and revising at this time what he had composed during the day. Thus Emanuel Bach might well say, speaking of his father: "We are accustomed to receive from Bach only masterpieces;" and even Mattheson, who is never very warm in Bach's praises, could not help exclaiming: "As long as Germany can boast of Bach and Handel, nothing can ever exceed their music."

One great peculiarity of Bach was the severe self-criticism which he exercised with regard to all his compositions. He constantly wrote many things which, upon a minute examination, seeming to him far from perfect, or unworthy of his name, were immediately consigned to oblivion. Long before Bach's time, when the Italians and French began to direct their especial attention to the cultivation of melody, and still more during his working, in the first half of the last century, when its enrichment and embellishment was the great aim, there was a belief that too much care could not be taken in the accumulation of musical ideas—such as expression, figures and rhythm. In order to bring these things nearer to the ear, they are all placed in the upper part—as it were in a variegated row—as much as possible to produce a strikingly melodious effect. But there was a want of substance in all this; one idea was repeated, perhaps in another octave by another instrument, or perhaps on other intervals, but this was all. In Bach's time the French, in their clavier compositions, showed the greatest talent in putting unmeaning passages into the most agreeable form. This sort of music claimed some little attention when neatly performed. Couperin and Marchand were heroes in this department of composition—a style which has maintained itself in France almost down to our own time.

Bach, in his earlier years, had written many things in this manner, which he afterwards altered. As an instance, we may name the prelude in C in the first part of "The well tempered Clavierchord." In its original conception the second half of the prelude is but a repetition of the first. At a later period of his life Bach altered this, considering the repetition superfluous. His matured opinions were, that everything should be based upon the principles of æsthetic unity. A series of pretty little fragments, however neatly put together, had in his eyes no claim to be considered as a work of art. The working out, analysis, and manifestation of one musical idea was what he considered a true artist should aim at accomplishing. Upon these principles all the works composed by Bach during his sojourn at Leipzig, were written. The prelude in D, in the second part of "The well-tempered Clavierchord," suffered in its first composition from want of clearness. Bach, however, considered its design good, and therefore had only to correct it in the working out which he did on several occasions. First, he added a transposition of the theme in the bass; then he completed some passages, and used them by transposition in various parts of the piece; finally, he altered and perfected some of the melodious sentences and figures. In its finished shape, this prelude is one of the finest of Bach's works.

London.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The celebrated pianist, Madame Clara Schumann, whose performance at the Monday Popular Concerts during the season of 1865 will not have been forgotten, appeared last night according to announcement, and played in the first part Beethoven's sonata in D minor, and in the second two of Schumann's romances for pianoforte and violin (Op. 94). In the last of these works Madame Schumann was accompanied by Herr Joachim.

Madame Schumann was rapturously welcomed on making her appearance, and at the end of Beethoven's sonata—a performance full of fire and enthusiasm—the applause was renewed with increased heartiness, and she was twice recalled to the platform. Still more interesting under the circumstances was her husband's own music, into which she entered, as is her wont, heart and soul. In Herr Joachim she found not only an incomparable, but a thoroughly sympathetic associate; and so pleased were the audience with these charming bagatelles, that at the termination of the last, both performers were called back. That the noble trio of Beethoven was finely played may easily be believed with such a trio of exponents as Madame Schumann, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti.

The concert began with a splendid performance of Spohr's first double-quartet for eight string instruments; the one in E minor, perhaps the most familiar of them all to amateurs of chamber music, and certainly to the patrons of the Monday Popular Concerts, to whom it was first introduced as far back as 1850. How Herr Joachim plays Spohr's music we need not stop to say, nor how admirably he was supported by Signor Piatti and the six gentlemen who took the subordinate instruments—subordinate, however, only in the sense that the first violin and the first violoncello necessarily take the lead. The double-quartet created a "furore" in the strongest acceptance of the term.

The vocal music was worthy of the rest. There was only one singer; but that singer was Miss Edith Wynne, whose great merit is becoming more and more widely acknowledged, and who never sang more exquisitely than on this occasion. She selected Mr. Arthur Sullivan's charming setting of Shakespeare's "Orpheus with his lute" (encored), and Schubert's "Die junge Nonne," one of the most pathetic and beautiful songs in existence. We have heard nothing more touching and heartfelt than Miss Edith Wynne's delivery of this, nor could it have been accompanied more perfectly than by Mr. Benedict. In short, it was the feature of a concert in which every piece, vocal and instrumental, was of the highest interest.—Morning Post, May 5.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—While "Conservatories" are springing up with emulous haste and advertisement all around us here (in Boston and New York), it may be interesting to know what they have in London, and how it fares with the old "Royal Academy". The following article is from The Queen:

Despite a rancorous opposition from certain amateurs, and base ingratitude from former pupils, the 'Tenterden Institution is still alive, and it has existed long enough to survive senseless opposition. The Academy formed in 1821 is still going on in 1867. It is absurd, therefore, to think of extinguishing the Institution, but it is quite legitimate to discuss the question of extending its influence. The patrons are Her Most Gracious Majesty (herself a distinguished amateur) and the Prince and Princess of Wales. The president is the Earl of Wilton, and the vice-presidents are the Duke of Leinster, the Earl Howe, Lord Wrottesley, and the Right Hon. Sir George Clerk, Bart. The directors are the Dukes of Newcastle and Leinster, the Marquis Townshend, Earls Wilton and Howe, Lords E. Hill Trevor, M.P. and Wrottesley; Sirs G. Clerk, F. A. Gore Ouseley, and John Pakington, M.P., C. W. Packe, Esq., M.P., T. T. Bernard, Esq., M.P., J. Lodge Atherton, Esq., Walter S. Roadwood, Esq., and the Hon. J. Rye. The committee of management comprises the names of Sir G. Clerk (chairman) and all the directors just mentioned. It will be thus seen that the amateur element is strongly embodied. The professional talent engaged includes the names of Sterndale Bennett (principal), Herr Otto Goldschmidt (vice-principal), honorary visitor, Cipriani Potter, Esq. (formerly principal). The list of professors for tuition in the various departments is formidable, including Dr. Bennett and Mr. A. S. Sullivan, for composition; Mr. John Goss, Dr. C. Steggall, Messrs. H. C. Bannister and Lunn (harmony, counterpoint, and fugue); Herr Goldschmidt, Messrs. Jewson, Harold Thomas, and O'Leary (pianoforte); Messrs. Westlake and R. H. Ayers (assistant pianoforte); Signor Manuel Garcia (singing); Mr. John Goss (organ music); Dr. Steggall (organ); M. Sainton, Messrs. Hill and Watson (violin); Mr. Aylward (violoncello); Mr. Svendsen (flute); and Mr. Lazarus (clarinet). These eminent professors are for the male department. For the lady students there is Mr. G. A. Macfarren for composition; Messrs. W. H. Holmes, E. Pauer, W. Dorrell, Walter Macfarren, A. O'Leary, and F. Westlake (piano). Signor Schira and Gilardoni (singing); Messrs. J. B. Chatterton and J. Cheshire (harp). There are two teachers besides—one for elocution in Mr. Walter Lacy, and in Italian, Signor Maggioni. Mr. C. Lucas, the late principal, presides at the class for reading from score figured bass, musical literature, and analysis; Mr. A. Blagrove heads the class for chamber instrumental music; and Mr. F. R. Cox teaches English vocal music and concerted vocal music.

Now, any pupil with the smallest aptitude for music and with the slightest disposition for study, must make way with such tuition as is afforded by the above masters. and if the Academy does not produce Mozarts and Mendelssohns, Bachs and Beethovens, it is not for the lack of good drilling, but simply because genius cannot be engendered by any scholastic discipline. Everyone of the latest prize scholars of the Conservatoire in Paris has signally failed recently as a composer. We have not heard that Leipzig or Vienna, Berlin or Stuttgart, Naples or Milan, have for a long time produced any striking or exceptional ability to startle the world. All that the continental conservatories have done has been to introduce accomplished artists to the world; and our Academy can boast of a long list of celebrities, some with creative powers, more, certainly, of executive ability.

The Academy has not at its disposal large Government grants; it is only lately that it has a subsidy of * Girolamo Frescobaldi, born in 1591, at Ferrara, was organist of S. Peter's at Rome, in the early part of the seventeenth century. He was called the "Father of Organ Music."

† Johann Jacob Froberger was born at Halle, in Saxony, (Handel's birthplace), in 1655. He was the celebrated pupil of Frescobaldi.

‡ Johann Pachelbel was born at Nuremberg in 1693. He is celebrated as one of the most famous German organists of his time.

Antonio Vivaldi, an Italian ecclesiastic and chapel master at the Conservatory of La Pietà at Venice. He was very celebrated both in Italy and Germany in the first half of the last century, although now completely forgotten.

£500 (voted annually). It is mainly dependent on private subscriptions and the fees paid by the students; the object is now to reduce these fees and to enable promising talent to have a free education. There are a few prizes, it is true, in the Academy: such as two King's scholarships, a Westmoreland scholarship, and a Potter exhibition; and recently have been added twelve free scholarships, four of which have been already competed for and filled up. According to the last circular issued from the Academy, the co-operation of the deans and chapters of cathedrals and collegiate bodies is earnestly sought and inducements are held out to students who wish to join military bands; but surely the two last mentioned incentives to study music are matters for Government intervention and more active support. The amount of £18 per session precludes the possibility of enrolling pupils from all classes of the community. The academical year is divided into two sessions of nineteen and a half weeks each. Now, for £36 the education desired is undoubtedly exceedingly cheap, but the system does not go sufficiently far to constitute a really national institution. The great support of a continental Conservatoire is derived from the existence of a national Opera House. In England there is no such feeder. The pupil who is a singer, unless he studies for the Italian stage, has no market for his talent; the instrumentalists are entirely dependent on foreign opera establishments in the metropolis. If the Society of Arts could raise funds to establish an English Opera House on a permanent basis, some good results might follow their late agitation for extending musical education. At present the supply of talent is about equal to the demand—that is, the demand being next to nothing, the amount of ability created is in the same ratio.

A very fine performance of Handel's "Israel" (perhaps the finest as yet produced in Exeter Hall) was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society yesterday week. The choruses went with marvellous spirit. Mr. Sims Reeves was at his best. The soprano occupation was divided between Miss Banks and Miss Robertine Henderson. In "The Lord is a man of war" Signor Foli (who joined with Mr. Weiss) made it evident that he may become an acquisition of very great value to our orchestras. His voice is excellent, his style is manly and unaffected; thirdly he is young. Madame Sainton-Dolby was the contralto. The next Oratorio is to be "Julias." Mr. Benedict's "St. Cecilia," will, we learn, be deferred till later in the season, it being hoped, by the postponement, to secure the services of Mlle. Tietjens. Meanwhile, the Cantata will be speedily produced at Liverpool.

The Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace will be resumed to-day, when, among other music, Mr. Sullivan's Overture, "In Memoriam," is to be given. Madame Arabella Goddard will be the solo player.—Athenæum.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Last Saturday's concert commenced with the overture of the "Siege of Corinth." The speciality of the afternoon was Beethoven's C minor Symphony, executed with remarkable exactness and precision. F. Schubert's "Fierabras" overture was a welcome novelty at the Crystal Palace, as affording the audience of these concerts fresh ground for that esteem in which Schubert is beginning to be held. Herr Strauss played with perfect taste Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and was warmly applauded. Mlle. Liebhart sang a trashy mazurka by Traventi. Signor Foli gave one or two vocal pieces with second rate success.

MANCHESTER.—The production of Handel's oratorio "Jephtha"—entire—at the Free Trade Hall, on Thursday, the 24th, has been one of the most interesting events of our musical season. It was brought out under the immediate personal superintendence of Mr. Chas. Hallé, forming the fourteenth of his series of grand weekly concerts. The most important character, Jephtha, judge of Israel and leader of the army—was sustained by Mr. Sims Reeves, who was in excellent voice, and exerted himself to the utmost. He was most cordially greeted on his first appearance in the orchestra. In the first part Jephtha consents to lead the Israelites against the Ammonites; this is done in recitative, his only song being "Sound, then, the last alarm," in which our great tenor soon proved that he was once more himself again. The second part shows Jephtha's triumphant return from his victory over the proud Ammonites. He makes a rash vow, and in recitative describes how that he is "Thrown from the summit of presumptuous joy down to the lowest depth of misery!" The recitatives and airs, "His mighty arm," "Horror! confusion," "Open thy marble jaws," "Deeper and deeper still," "Waft her angels," which describes the joy of the conqueror, and his subsequent relapse to horror and despair, were given by Mr. Sims Reeves with feeling, taste and power, and above all with an intelligence beyond all praise. Miss Edmonds as Iphis the devoted daughter sang very sweetly; the tone of resignation she imparted to the "Farewell, ye limpid springs," was much admired. Miss Palmer as Sorge, the mother, displayed considerable feeling. Zeluz the warrior (Mr. Weiss) has chiefly recitative to deliver, and this he did in a clear and distinct manner. Mrs. Brooke and Mrs. Warren, both of Manchester, are deserving of commendation for the manner in which—as Ilmor and the Angel, they both gave their explanatory recitatives. The chorus "When his loud voice in thunder spoke," which is in Handel's very best manner, went magnificently. Mr. Hallé's conducting, the band, and the organ, in the hands of Mr. H. Walker, are all worthy to be praised.

COLOGNE. La Società del Quartetto di Firenze, under the direction of Jean Becker, gave yesterday evening a quartet Soirée at the Hôtel Ditsch, and was highly successful in the performance of a quartet in C by Mozart, a quartet in A, (Op. 41, No. 3), by R. Schumann, and a quartet in E major, (Op. 59, No. 2), by Beethoven. This society, who, on their way from Florence, intend visiting London next season, represent a musical alliance between Germany and Italy, Jean Becker and Friedrich Hilpert (first violin and violoncello), being Germans, and Enrico Masci and Luigi Chiostrini (second violin and viola), Italians.

LEIPZIG.—On Tuesday last, the 29th of January, the musical society Euterpe gave its seventh concert, which was, as usual, very well attended. The first part of the programme included the overture to the "Zauberflöte;" the antique concerto of Luigi Boccherini for violoncello and orchestra, capitolly rendered by Herr D. Popper, a very fantastic "Fantasiestück an die Nacht" for contralto, solo, and orchestra, by Rob. Volkmann, indifferently sung by Fräul. C. Martini; and the andante out of the concerto for violoncello by Molique, followed by two little trifling Muskenballaden, Arlequin and Popillon (composed by Herr Popper), very well played by the said violoncellist. The second part of the programme brought the "Mansfred" of Byron, with music by Rob. Schumann, for contralto solo, declamation, chorus, and orchestra, very effectively given. The execution on the part of the orchestra was, as I have already told you in my reports of this musical society in December last, completely void of nuances.

The 14th Gewandhaus concert was exclusively dedicated to the oratorio "Esther," of Handel, as arranged by F. Hiller. The soli were sung by Fräul. E. Wagner (soprano), Frau A. Joachim (alto), Herr Schild (tenor), and Herr Scaria (bass). The only real artist of all, both as regards style and expression, was the contralto singer. The chorus was very efficient, and the orchestra first rate, as always. The work however, being one of the weakest of Handel's productions, met with a very cold reception on the part of the public.—Orchestra.

Musical Correspondence.

Cincinnati. Hopkin's New Music Hall.

GLENDAL, O., Feb. 12.—The Cincinnatians have been enjoying a little musical festival all to themselves, in a very unostentatious way, the occasion being the inauguration of Mr. Hopkins's new Music Hall. Now don't imagine at once that this Music Hall is something of the grand order, an imitation for instance of that of Boston, which, it seems to me, might well have been named the Temple of Apollo, nor that it is of the mongrel sort, combining theatre, dancing hall, drinking room and the like, and wearing its name only for respectability's sake. The hall built and owned by Mr. Hopkins, President of the Cincinnati Harmonic Society, is delightfully original and unique in design and admirably adapted to its purpose. It is not large, being only 100 feet in length by 40 in width, and of course is not to be used for such musical productions as combine a large chorus with full orchestra. It is designed rather for symphony and other instrumental concerts and, not least of all, for the rehearsals of the Harmonic Society, the singers occupying in rehearsal the body of the hall. We doubt if there is another musical society in the world which can boast of such elegant and luxurious private apartments as the "Harmonic" of Cincinnati are now possessed of, through the liberality, good taste and enterprise of their President. Adjoining the hall, which is on the first floor and approached by a wide, easy flight of stairs, is a large ante-room,—itself a very prettily proportioned hall,—for the accommodation of members of the Society on rehearsal nights, and in the basement are other rooms to be used in connection with the hall as convenience requires.

If you had been by my side, Mr. Editor, on the night of the complimentary Soirée, when the Harmonic Society occupied the platform, and the house was filled with the musical élite of the city, and on the following afternoon, when the small but well organized orchestra were performing the first of their Symphony Concerts, to the delight of a very attentive and cultivated audience, I feel sure you would have been reminded, more than once, of those charming little music halls of the old world, where we have spent such pleasant hours together; the Sing-Academie in Berlin, for instance, with Grell conducting his well-trained chorus, or the beautiful hall of the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. The Hopkins Music Hall does not resemble these in style of architecture or decoration, but suggests them in its fine acoustic properties, its seclusion and quiet, and the refinement and elegance everywhere displayed in its construction. The style of architecture or rather of decoration is Moorish, consisting of columns and arches over a ground of warm grey, the ceiling divided into large squares placed diagonally, having a ground of deep blue and bright Arabesque figures. The stage end is a semi-circular apse with a dome ceiling of deep blue. The hall is lighted by six chandeliers of an elegant Moorish pattern, and these are reflected prettily in two handsome mirrors placed on each side the apse end. Altogether, the hall has a warm, cosy, and most attractive appearance.

Having said this much of the hall, let me now say a word about the complimentary Soirée given by Mr. Hopkins to an invited audience the night before the public opening. The Harmonic Society performed without orchestral accompaniment. The choruses, numbering four,—two from the Elijah and two from Naaman,—were sung with great spirit and promptness by about one hundred and sixty voices. The programme included a quartet by Costa, the octet "He shall give his angels," by Mendelssohn, and a number of solos, all of which were admirably rendered, and some in a manner deserving of special praise, were it proper to make distinctions in alluding to a private entertainment. The next day, the Hall was formally opened to the public by the orchestra, under Carl Barus, giving us the first of a series of Symphony Concerts. On this occasion the Symphony was a beautiful one of Haydn's, and the Overture was Weber's Oberon. We had also a quartet for violin, violoncello, piano and cabinet-organ, which, however well it might answer as a novelty, certainly does not deserve a place in a concert of this class. The composition was pleasing enough, being a sort of Fantasia on the Luther Choral "Eine feste Burg," but really the feeble, thin tones of the reed-organ came near to turning the whole thing into a burlesque. However well the reed-organ may answer as a substitute for the real instrument in accompanying church choirs, it surely can never bear a principal part in rendering grand music, for it is sure to belittle whatever it takes a part in. It is very much to be hoped that these Symphony concerts may be well sustained, for there is nothing in the way of social recreation and culture that Cincinnati more needs. The orchestra is not large (it reminded me of our Liebig of Berlin memory); but with the addition of a few more strings would be quite large enough for the hall, and, if I may judge from their giving of the Haydn Symphony, is capable of rendering in a thorough and careful manner the best classical works. We are promised a Symphony by Mendelssohn and one of Schumann's, and, among others, Beethoven's Fifth. The Harmonic Society has in rehearsal Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-nacht, which will be given publicly in a short time. Until then, Yours,

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 11.—A word from a late Bostonian in relation to what is doing for the advancement of the art of music in this locality, may not lack interest to your readers. Last year a musical society was formed here, consisting of about fifty members, and called the Philharmonic Society of Washington. "St. Paul" was the first Oratorio undertaken. That was given on the 7th of March last. This season the members were augmented to one hundred. "The Messiah" was rendered, for the first time in this city, by them on Christmas night, with the assistance of Mrs. Butts and Miss Paulie C. Ewer, Sopranos; Mrs. J. P. Caulfield, Contralto; Mr. Arthur Mathison of New York, Tenor, and Mr. L. V. Gannon, Baritone. This performance was very creditable to all who participated in it, and won for the society many friends, some of whom urged a repetition. It was finally agreed to repeat it, and in such a manner as to eclipse all previous efforts. Heretofore, all attempts at procuring an orchestra had proved futile; but this time, by combining volunteers with those who could be induced to desert their posts at the theatres, an orchestra of twenty-two pieces was improvised. But what contributed more toward making this the great event of the season than all else, was the fact of Miss Julia E. Houston's consenting to favor them with her assistance. As soon as this became known, and that Mr. J. F. Winch, Basso, also of Boston, and Mr. A. Matthison, Tenor, of New York, were to aid in this rendering of the Oratorio, the rush for seats was unprecedented, the whole house having been sold by Saturday night for the following Wednesday's performance. A third rendering was then agreed upon to take place on the succeeding Friday, the seats for which were all secured by Thursday. Thus you see the Society have given three performances of "The Messiah" within about six weeks. All who attended are loud in their praise of the Boston singers especially, and all music lovers regard their coming here an especial favor.

The Society have by these efforts obtained a local reputation, which ensures them the public favor for the future. Mr. J. P. Caulfield is the Conductor, and is not far behind Mr. Zerrahn in the effective use of his baton.

NEW HAVEN, Feb. 12.—We have still to chronicle an almost uninterrupted succession of musical entertainments, the most noticeable of which are as follows: another dissolving view of the Bateman Troupe—whose "last" concerts remind one of the "preliminary farewells" given by Gottschalk; a Varian-Hoffman concert; a good rendering, by the Mendelssohn Society, of the Elijah, and the appearance of Miss Wilhelmina Ives, a debutante who is said to have played several difficult piano compositions with good effect.

It will be seen from the foregoing, that, although the season has not been productive of great music, it has furnished plenty of a lighter kind, and an excellent quality of that; but, as glad things, like sad ones, come in battalions, it is now our privilege to announce that last evening the first of a series of three Philharmonic concerts was given in this city, under the direction of Prof. G. J. Stoeckel. The soloists were Miss Maria Brainerd, Soprano, and Messrs. Boehm and Schmitz, Clarinet and French Horn. Here is the programme:

Symphony, "Pastorale".....Beethoven.
Aria, "Ah! Perfido".....Beethoven.

Divertissement and Fantasia (Clarinet).....H. Klehl.
Overture, "Der Freischütz".....Weber.
Waltz, "L'Etoile".....Arditi.
Invitation à la Valse.....Weber.
Fantasia for Horn.....Schmitts.
Prayer for Lullaby.....Waltzes.
Overture to William Tell.....Rossini.

In making the above selections Mr. Stoeckel did well to introduce L'Invitation and the Tell Overture, two pieces of that rare description, which is popular and at the same time worth performing. The Orchestra was too thin to do the Symphony full justice, and it was coldly received by the audience, but the Tell overture, though taken with rather too slow a tempo, sounded better,—the pastoral movement, particularly, giving the very smell of the "pine trees and the old rocks with the moss on them."

The aria "Ah Perfido!" is particularly interesting. Beethoven has here to deal with that most complex of all complexities—a woman's heart,—and in this little scena he has painted all the bitterness, the tenderness, "the tears and tortures and the touch of joy" belonging to a love without faith.

First there is the fury of a woman scorned. "Ha, perfidious! perjured traitor that thou art!" Then the wrath of heaven is invoked: "If there be justice and pity, surely they will conspire to punish thee!" Then comes the reaction, sure to follow: "Ah no! stay avenging gods! spare his heart—strike mine!" This sweet relenting finds voice in an aria, full of tender entreaty: "Ah, in pity, do not leave me!" for now the bitterness fades away, and all the old loneliness and desolation comes again.

It was a pleasure to hear this piece rendered by a singer so conscientious and artistic as Miss Brainerd. It is true that the recitative called for an element of tragedy which is not in her nature; but she appreciated her task, and gave it much of earnestness and beauty. Her rendering of the adagio, "Per pietà," which was entirely within her power, was exquisite, and left no sense of insufficiency.

In listening to her we always receive the impression that she regards the religion of her art; and this, together with the excellent quality of her voice, renders her singing worthy of the warmest commendation.

WHEELING, W. VA., FEB. 20.—Institutions for the cultivation of the intellectual faculties are scattered over this country in great number. Indeed, it would seem as if the American people aimed more at number than excellence, for many of our schools must be weighed by a very charitable standard to obtain this latter attribute. True as this is in regard to institutions devoted to a dissemination of general literary knowledge, how much more so in regard to those which lay some stress upon music. In no branch of education can there be, and is there, so much humbuggery practised as in music, and all because an immediate effect, calculated to dazzle the unsophisticated, is desired.

The affectionate Mr. Smith, suddenly enriched by an oil well, expects his daughter to play a tune when she comes home from boarding school; and so during ten long months a repertory of tunes is driven or coaxed into Laura's head, carefully shelved there and labelled with alluring names. When she comes home she plays these tunes, one after another, to her gaping and admiring parents, but the stock on hand is never increased; to all additions her musical storehouse is locked forever. She cannot take up the simplest piece and unravel it with her own knowledge of music. Whereas a foundation should have been laid, no matter how high it rose, so it was substantial, a little filagree and stucco work is all that was laid there. Like the beautiful pomum Paradisi, it was just the thing to please the mother's fancy, yet how soon would the hollow apple burst and scatter its dust in her eyes! By and by the impatient parents tire of the scant ornamentation of their daughter's intellectual edifice. They have heard the old tunes often enough; something new is desired, and so a pile of new music is ordered. But alas! there is in the child no material for remodelling, nor moulds in which to cast new forms, and at last, disgusted and disheartened with herself, she folds her arms and turns away from the golden-tongued muse. Like the night-blooming cereus she has had her hour of bloom, and closes her petals forever.

Laura is a type of the most numerous class of seminary-bred misses. That this plan of teaching music is a radical evil no one will deny, and until something is done to uproot it, young ladies will be led along in Laura's footsteps, and their musical acquirements be cast in the same models. The evil lies not so much in the parents as in the schools. Why do these cater to the wishes and whims of the former? If the teacher be told to teach the child music, he or she ought not, for the sake of momentary glitter, or to please the mother's vanity, to teach it otherwise than fundamentally, scientifically and progressively. Any other method is folly and humbug. Worse yet—it is a downright swindle. The father is humbugged out of his money, advantage is taken of the mother's ignorance, and the poor child is cheated out of her education. Institutions of learning should be as reliable in their professions as leading tradesmen. If a man wants to buy an article of merchandise, the fair value of which he does not know, he goes to an honest merchant and relies on his word for its value. Why do schools not furnish genuine musical instruction instead of the good-for-nothing imitation? Simply because they get just as much money for the one as the other; a great amount of labor is saved; Commencement day passes off with eclat, and the pupils can show something to their friends and parents. Well, say the teachers, what credit would the child get if she played a nicely fingered étude for her parents? Might she not, as well, play fugues to a fence-post?

Painful as it is to be compelled to paint in such sombre colors the features of musical education, as generally conducted, it is all the more agreeable, now and then, to see the obverse and be able to use brighter tints. And such was my pleasure on the evening of Feb. 6. With many others, including the members of the Senate and Legislature of W. Va., I repaired to the Seminary of Mt. de Chantal, located near Wheeling, and conducted by the Sisters of the Visitation. The attraction consisted in the performance, by the pupils, of an operetta, "The Miracle of the Roses," by Luigi Bordese. Of the merits of the composition itself I shall not speak, save that it is written in the best Italian style, some of the choruses presenting fine contrapuntal effects. The action, too, does not concern us. What chiefly concerns us is the musical performance, and of this I cannot write sufficiently laudatory. It could be seen that each singer filled a sphere easily within her grasp, and I was convinced that the operetta was not prepared by dint of labor (it was only two weeks in rehearsal,) for momentary effect, but that it was a product of sound culture and positive knowledge. Especially commendable was the singing of Miss Mena Waring, of Georgetown, D.C., and Miss Ella Gordon, of Parkersburg, W. Va. The last named child is scarcely more than fifteen years old, but has a rich, round, full, sweet and sympathetic contralto. So devotedly does she court the muse of her choice, that she gives a few concerts every season to defray her expenses at school.

The vocal department in this school is under the guidance of Sister Mary Agnes Gubert, a former pupil of Perelli of Philadelphia, and herself one of the most finished singers to be found anywhere. Her singing of the "Happy Birdling" was remarkably fine. The instrumental department is under the control of Sister Eulalia Pearce, formerly of Boston, a lady of rare musical taste and culture. The system of education pursued here is thorough. The pupils are chained down to exercises, and only allowed to soar into more delectable regions when their wings are expanded. The greatest care is taken in disciplining the hands and the getting rid of bad habits of vocalization. The taste, too, of the pupils is cultivated; classical compositions only are used, and among the modern chiefly those of Heller. The idea of the composer is always pointed out, and frequently Sister Eulalia writes, and reads to the pupils, a critique and explanation of the piece, which she does very tastefully.

But it were tedious to go into details. No music-lover should stay in Wheeling a day without visiting this seminary, and assuring himself of its high art position. It is one of which not only this State, but the whole country, may feel proud. All the great public artists who have come to Wheeling, have visited it, and gone away delighted. I write this only with the motive that the general public may hear of an institution so well worthy their esteem and commendation; one in which music is taught for music's sake, and not for the sake of making a shallow parade on Commencement day. ### Orchestral Concerts.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The Harvard Musical Association, aiming only at the best thing practicable in a purely artistic sense, finds more and more encouragement. Our people readily and steadfastly believe in good music, if the music makers and providers only will believe in them. The audience of Feb. 15th was by far the largest yet. The programme was this:

Symphony in D.....Mozart.
Violin Concerto, in E minor.....Mendelssohn.
Madame Camilla Urso.
Overture to "Fierabras".....Schubert.
Piano-forte Concerto, in A minor, op. 85.....Hummel.
J. C. D. Parker.
Ballade et Polonaise, for Violin, op. 38.....Vieuxtemps.
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.

To make room for CAMILLA URSO in a programme already made up (she generously insisting upon giving us the pleasure which the storm had robbed us of when she tried so hard to reach us in January), a short Symphony had to be substituted for the formidable one in C by Schubert. One taste of Mozart this season had already revived an appetite for more, and so this little "French Symphony" so-called, written in Paris in Mozart's early days (he tells how happy he was after the first performance, and how he went into a café and sipped a sherbet and then said a Pater noster), was selected. It is one of the smallest and lightest of his Symphonies, but it has the Mozart fascination; it is purely musical, spontaneous, and in the fugued last movement, finely complicated, shows already the learned musician. Like a June day it put all in a balmy mood, for it was nicely played.

The Fierabras Overture, one of Schubert's best works, full of fiery genius, made a much deeper impression than it did last year. The Orchestra for once achieved a real pianissimo in the swelling and dying tremolo at the opening, which almost took the listener's breath away. That one effect insured a hearing for the whole, and it went finely. So did the Egmont, another strong thing, of still more concentrated fire, and a good thing to end with after Hummel's prolixity.

Madame Urso's playing of the Mendelssohn Concerto was a marvel of art; not to have had

it would indeed have been a great loss. We cannot conceive of tones more pure, phrasing more clear, and perfectly finished, truer feeling alike in each detail and of the whole work, in fact of a more complete and sympathetic realization and expression of the composition as a whole. It became alive in all its unity and power and beauty. The only qualification is that it was feminine; there was not of course the manly force, the enthusiastic and heroic onswEEP of Carl Rosa's bow, which carries all before it; in place of that we have here a finer finish, and in place of his larger tones finer ones which are purity itself. The lady is the more matured, consummate artist; the former has it in him to become all that perhaps, and more; he is a most interesting artistic character and inspires every one with faith in him; but there is room yet for study, for refining and perfecting his delivery. His direction is perhaps the greater one, for he is on the Joachim road, and has drunk at the clear Bach springs. The Mendelssohn Concerto is the very piece to show Camilla Urso's power to best advantage; for Mendelssohn's genius is oftenest, though not always, feminine. Camilla and Carl both appear to us to have genius; both enter into the spirit of such a work; both have warmth and breadth of style; but the bolder youth sometimes leaps difficulties, where the woman with a fine, sure instinct and the grace of patience finds whatever charm they hide. We count it one of the most interesting experiences of a musical life to have heard such a work played by two such artists within so short a time. Rosa, though the younger, has had far more familiarity with classical composers than Urso; the greater wonder, therefore, that she all at once so thoroughly conceives and feels and renders such a work as this Concerto. Her rendering of the Andante is something divine; in the first Allegro, too, she shows not only finest feeling, but sure nervous grasp and accent; it was in the Finale that we chiefly missed the dash and energy of Rosa. The Vieuxtemps Ballade was tenderly and sweetly sung, and the Polonaise showed her well-known virtuosity more brilliantly than ever. Indeed Camilla Urso seems to have all her old artistic enthusiasm revived in her, with more enlarged ideas and earnest purpose. Technically she had become a rare artist even when a child; all this now, after life's deep trials, and with a woman's motives, stands at her bidding, and with study of music as well as of an instrument, of the masters, as well as of the momentary response of publics, what may not be hoped?

Mr. PARKER, modest, genuine artist in his whole character and habit, enters into these concerts with a loyal devotion to their high end. He has not the strength and brilliant dash of many pianists, and his best place is not before a great public, but his renderings are fine, correct and tasteful, and his participation carries a moral weight with it. This time he played quite admirably; if listeners grew weary, it was Hummel's fault and not his; for with all its graces and occasional felicities, Hummel's piano music (always excepting the Septet, and one or two other things) is diffuse and tedious, its elegance a faded fashion. Here the first Allegro is decidedly the best movement, having a vigorous and pregnant leading thought, well worked out, although the second subject, as it enters in the long orchestral prelude with flutes, is commonplace enough. The Lar- ghetto, not very long, seems long by its unmeaning sentimentality of florid passage work; and the final Rondo is nothing but interminable monotony of prettiness. In the days when Art was elegance, Hummel set the lessons for fashionable young ladies and for good earnest music students too; but now there is no keeping it in vogue. It was well to have it in these Concerts just for once to convince us of the truth of history.

Of the seventh Concert (yesterday), with ROSA, PERABO and Mrs. CARY for soloists, with a Beethoven Symphony and Violin Concerto, the Chaconne and an Aria by Bach, &c., we must speak next time. The eighth and last Concert will come March 29th, when we shall have the Heroic Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille". Overture, Bach's Toccata in F, arranged for orchestra; and Miss HOUSTON will sing Mozart's "Non temer," and Mr. LEONHARD will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto in G, and the Andante spianato and Polonaise of Chopin.

An extra Concert will be given (probably a fortnight later) for the benefit of the Orchestra, when Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be brought out in full.

CONCERT FOR THE CRETANS. The Concert on Monday afternoon, Feb. 18, arranged by the Concert Committee of the Harvard Musical Association, "in furtherance of the subscription for sending food and clothing to the exiled and starving women and children of the Cretan patriots, fighting for liberty against the Turks," was in every sense a remarkable success. Nearly every seat in the Music Hall was sold several days before the concert, and many stood up through the whole performance. There were at least 2,500 persons present, and a more inspiring audience in point of character and culture, or more sympathetic to fine music, as well as to the call of Freedom and Humanity in time of fiery trial, was never seen. All the musicians cheerfully and freely gave their service: Mr. ZERRAHN and the whole "Symphony Concerts" Orchestra of 52, whom he conducts; Mr. KREISSMANN and the Orpheus Musical Society; Miss HOUSTON and Mr. P. H. POWERS, as solo singers, and Messrs. DRESEL, PERABO, LANG and LEONHARD, as pianists. The Directors of the Music Hall had freely given its use; and a good part of the expenses of printing, ticket-selling, &c., had been generously remitted; so that the occasion was a hearty one. The Concert resulted in a contribution of $2,249.22 to the Cretan cause: the gross receipts being $2,460. The Greek Relief Committee have publicly thanked and complimented the artists, but we have not room for the correspondence. It was a noble act on the part of the hard-working members of the Orchestra, especially, to give their time so freely, which we trust will be remembered; an opportunity will soon occur, as will be seen above.—But we have now to do with the concert as a musical event. The programme, at once classical and apt to the occasion, was as follows:

- Part I.
1 Overture to "Idomeneo, Rè di Creta".....Mozart.
2 a Chorus of Priests: "O Isis and Osiris" from the "Magic Flute".....Mozart.
b Double Chorus from the "Edipus Coloneus" of Sophocles.....Mendelssohn.
Orpheus Musical Society.
Part II.
1 Duet for Two Pianos (8 hands): "Les Contrastes." Mochales.
Andante con moto.—Fugue.—Finale, alla Siciliana.
Messrs. Dresel, Perabo, Lang and Leonhard.
2 Song of the Harem-Keeper from "The Seraglio" Mozart.
Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen.
3 Selections from the "Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven.
a Duet for Soprano and Bass.
Miss J. E. Houston and Mr. P. H. Powers.
b Chorus of Dervishes.
Orpheus Musical Society.
c Turkish March.
Part III.
Fifth Symphony, in C minor.....Beethoven.
Allegro. Andante. Scherzo. Finale, Triumphant March.

The selections of the First Part, suggesting the old classic glory of Greece, would have been fuller, had the limits of a single programme allowed. Thus, besides the noble chorus from the "Edipus" (described in our last), choruses from the "Antigone," that in praise of Bacchus for instance, might have been given. But one was sufficient, and it was remarkably well sung by the Orpheus, as was also the rich, sonorous, solemn "Isis and Osiris" of Mozart. A larger number of voices would, however, have been better. Mr. KREISSMANN had them under excellent control and put great fire into them.

The eight-hand piano piece,—not a great composition in itself, it must be confessed—answered the purpose hinted in its title, "Les Contrastes," in forming a transition and a prelude to the Turkish music and the glimpses at the changed condition of the Hellenic race in modern times. It was made very effective, however, in the execution; for four masters were united in it, and it was done with a power, a precision, a perfect unity and aplomb which could not fail to make an impression. The idea of Moscheles seems to have been to contrast German and Italian music, for there is here and there a part which sounds for all the world like a Donizetti opera finale.—It was intended to have three pieces from Mozart's "Entführung aus dem Serail;" the tenor air of the Christian lover to his captive mistress; then the blustering and threatening buffo song of Osmin, the harem-keeper; and then the spirited and humorous duet (tenor and bass): "Vivat Bacchus!" in which, his fears of Mahomet's "prohibitory law" to the contrary, he is coaxed into taking wine and so robbed of his vigilance. But it was necessary to be contented with the bass solo alone. Mr. POWERS, who very kindly undertook it at short notice in the place of Mr. Rudolphsen, who was ill, did it more justice than it was fair to expect under the circumstances. If it had not the buffo volubility and glibness, it was at least a clear, sonorous, and artistic rendering. The orchestral parts had been well arranged for two pianos by Mr. DRESEL, and were effectively played by him and Mr. LEONHARD.

The little Duet from "The Ruins of Athens," between a Greek man and woman lamenting their heavy burdens under their Moslem masters, beautifully sung by Miss HOUSTON and Mr. POWERS, and accompanied by the two pianists, is very simple, but very touching, and made a deep impression. It brought up vividly the present suffering of the Cretans. The wild, fanatical Derwish chorus, with its whirling crescendo accompaniment, all in unison, is one of the most exciting and picturesque bits to be found in any dramatic or melo-dramatic music; who but Beethoven could have conjured up such a picture with such simple means? It was sung and accompanied by the orchestra with great spirit; and the ever popular Turkish March, which followed, charmed as usual by its bright local coloring, and with its closing pianissimo we let the Turks go out.

For the Third Part was reserved the real grandeur and inspiration of the concert, the Fifth Symphony, which here spoke significantly for the glorious Future of Greece, as the preceding parts had done of its Past and Present. All of the struggle of high aspiration with destiny is expressed in its first movement; all of highest, calmest faith and reassurance in the Andante; all the restlessness of soul and nerves strung for great action in the Scherzo; while the march-like movement into which it bursts in the Finale, sweeps everything along with it in its irresistible, sublime flood of triumph. The old Symphony was splendidly played, and was of course what chiefly realized all that was expected musically of the concert, the other portions only preparing the way and leading up to it significantly.

The concert certainly was one of the best musical events of Boston. And not the least interesting fact about it is, that in this case the programme was not at all made for the performers, but the artists cheerfully came in, each to do the part required, however small, in carrying out the design of the programme. Would that it were oftener so!

The ORCHESTRAL UNION made a good opening of their Wednesday Afternoon Concerts this week. There were about thirty instruments, with ZERRAHN for Conductor, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture was rendered with such delicacy that it had fresh charm. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, too, went finely. The other pieces: arrangement of Schubert's "Eloge des Larmes," the Bridal Procession from Lohengrin, and a luscious, lively Waltz by Gungl, were all enjoyable.—Next Wednesday ERNST PERARO will play for them—Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor, and the Symphony will be the "Scotch" one by the same master.

Oratorios.

The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY, with the distinguished aid of Madame PAREPA, have performed "Jephtha" and "The Creation" on the last two Sunday evenings.

"Jephtha," Handel's latest Oratorio, had not been heard in Boston for many years, and was only remembered by the fine tenor recitative and air and one or two choruses. It shows throughout the ripeness of his consummate art, and contains some of his finest inspirations. The choruses, all of them, though they are comparatively free from fugues, are very original and grand. "When his loud voice in thunder spoke," "How dark, O Lord, are thy decrees," "They ride on whirlwinds," "In glory high, in might serene," &c., are singularly graphic and imaginative, and the choruses were generally well sung, with full orchestral accompaniment and organ. But, it must be confessed, the work abounds with solos of a rather formal, uninspiring cut, especially in the First Part, and might have been abridged to advantage by the omission of some of them entirely, as it was somewhat by leaving off the minor strain with the Da Capo from several of the longer ones. In the second part the solos are more interesting; especially those two gems for the tenor: the recitative; "Deeper and deeper still" and the air, "Waft her, angels," which Braham used to give so wonderfully, as Sims Reeves does now. Mr. Arthurson, too, has sung them here in perfect style and feeling, though with limited vocal means. This time Mr. SIMPSON did his best with them and really achieved a good success. To the earlier, heroic strains of Jephtha he was hardly equal.

The soprano airs for the most part furnished no great opportunity for PAREPA; she sang them of course artistically, as she does everything, with clear and copious tone and faultless vocalization, but naturally enough much of the time with a free and easy business-like routine, securing an effect now and then by the unnecessary holding out of a clear high tone, great audiences being still children enough to applaud such tricks. But "Tune the soft melodious lute" was exquisitely sung.

Mrs. J. S. CART took the Contralto part of Storge wife of Jephtha, which contains the richest and most pathetic of the solo music, full of presentiment of woe; and her warm, sweet voice, and uniformly true style and feeling, were what the part required. The part of Hamor, a young warrior, betrothed to Iphis, was entrusted to Miss KATE RAMETTI. It is commonly sung by a female voice in England, and certainly was not written by Handel for a baritone (as has been suggested), but possibly for that species of voice known in England as the Counter-Tenor, which is commutable with the Contralto, and which there, in the choruses, sustains most of the part which we give to contraltos. To give it to a baritone would be to invert the parts in the Quartet, turning thirds into sixths and vice versa. Miss Rametti's voice is musical and rich, well cultivated, and she sings with feeling; the principal drawback was that modesty, amounting even to timidity, which only wins the sympathy of the best part of an audience; and this time there was the greater cause for it, that she was but recovering from a severe cold and had been called upon to take an unthankful part at very short notice. We trust she will not be discouraged, for we believe it to be in her to become a valuable oratorio singer. Miss CLARA M. LORING made her debut in the Music Hall in the single recitative and air of the Angel; her clear, fresh, sweet soprano, and the way in which she entered into the spirit of the music, won her a success. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, in the part of Zebul, wholly recitative, except once near the end (where each of the characters is led up to the footlights in turn to sing a parting recitative and air), declaimed with weight and dignity, albeit somewhat monotonously. The Music Hall was crowded, and the performances generally admired.

Haydn's "Creation," beautiful as it is, has got to be a very old story, and it was therefore amazing to find a Hall so crammed with standing ticket-holders that it was very difficult to find passage way to seats; too full, in fact, so that some people became nervous. Doubtless PAREPA was the great attraction; and certainly her singing of this music (of which we have had evidence before) is something magnificent. If it has not all the inspiration, and comes not from so deep a nature, as Jenny Lind, it is in all else as near perfect as one can ever hope to hear. How admirable the management of that voice which, with such vast amount of unremitting work, never loses any of its freshness!

Mr. WINCH, the young tenor, has a pleasing quality and good power of voice; but his delivery is for the most part stiff and dry; there is yet much need of culture and of practice; he is free from affectation though, from poor sentimental mannerism, addressing himself to his work manfully and simply. Mr. WHITNEY's ponderous bass told well again, but he must guard against sameness.

CROWDED OUT: Our notices of four Chamber Concerts (Rosa's, Perabo's, Petersilea's). The man of types and forms says no room for more matter; so next time.

OF THAYER'S "BEETHOVEN," and some other new works, the Athenaeum says:

The influx of musical literature of more than ordinary interest is somewhat perplexing. We shall defer a notice of Mr. Thayer's elaborate (not to say exhaustive) Life of Beethoven till the work is complete, and do so the more willingly because of the peculiar circumstances of its publication. The work though written in English, appears first in a German translation, its author being desirous of thus exposing himself to German comment and criticism before he gives his labor of love its final form. This, however conscientious a measure, is hardly satisfactory to the purchasers of the first issue; and we cannot but fancy that such touching and reouching can hardly take place without the work of art (which every biography should be, as well as a work of research) losing something of taste and proportion. In such a literary subject as this, there is small possibility of one man's patience or ingenuity arriving at a perfection which shall close it against laborers to come. Think (to illustrate from another world than that of Music) of the seemingly endless treasures of revelation regarding Alexander Pope, his correspondence, and his associates, which the last years have disclosed. Only a few weeks ago we were hearing of a new "haul" of letters, from a great family collection, the existence of which had not been known to those the most deeply interested in the subject. There are writers who have weighed and waited, till life has gone by, and the work has been left unfinished. The above, we need not say is no plea for over haste in rushing into print.—Of Herr Engel's new book on National Music, a sequel to his former treatise on more ancient art, we shall speak ere long, with the detail which its careful merit deserves. A third publication of foreign origin is no less full of interest; this containing letters of some of the greatest German composers, collected by Dr. Nohl. Among these, Haydn figures admirably and significantly. There is nothing nobler or more heart-cheering in the annals of an art which has been held by his contemporaries to breed jealousies and small vanities than his warm eager recognition of Mozart's prodigal genius and science in combination. There is a treasure, again of letters by Mendelssohn, many, if not all, of which are new to us.

Our readers will remember that the old Academy building upon the site of the present one, was first opened to the public October 2d, 1854, by Grisi and Mario, under the direction of Mr. Hackett, and that on the night of May 21, 1866, it was burned to the ground.

In external appearance, the new Academy very nearly resembles its predecessor. It is not so high by fifteen feet, but that is the only curtailment of the original dimensions. The main points wherein the present structure differs from that which it replaces are these: The auditorium of the new theatre is some five feet shorter than formerly; there are twenty-eight proscenium parlors instead of twelve; there are twenty-two additional mezzanine loges; the seating capacity of the balcony has been augmented, and that of the parquet diminished; the fourth tier is abolished; the aisles and inner passages have been widened; increased lobby-room is obtained; two additional flights of stone stairs unite the ground and second floors; the roof has been depressed fifteen feet; the auditorium is enclosed within solid brick walls; the original horse-shoe shape is modified, and the massive pillars under the galleries are done away with, so that a clear view of the stage can be had from any position; the decorations are much more costly and elegant; and, lastly, a magnificent chandelier, overhanging the centre of the parquet, will increase the brilliancy of the house.

The gas pipes have been enlarged and improved, for the purpose of obtaining a better flow of gas. If the Academy does not light up brilliantly, the fault will be the gas company's. All the brackets and chandeliers have been manufactured expressly for this establishment by Tiffany & Co.

The aggregate seating capacity has been diminished about five hundred; but this counts as nothing, since now every seat is desirable, while nearly all know that there were five hundred places in the burned edifice that were utterly valueless as far as seeing the stage went, and which were rarely occupied. In a financial point of view, there will not be any material difference, the additional boxes and balcony seats balancing the revenue formerly represented in the fourth tier or amphitheatre.

The auditorium is enclosed by a brick wall, sixteen inches in thickness, thus forming a building within the building. Exteriorly, this wall (which takes the place of what, in the old Academy, was merely a thin wooden partition) is plastered and hard-finished; but the inner side has been clap-boarded from floor to ceiling, making a huge sounding-board, which, it is hoped, will materially enhance the acoustic value of the theatre. This sound-board is coated with canvas, on which Signor Gariboldi is painting medallions and tasteful borders.

The balcony has been considerably enlarged, having now eight rows of chairs; while the parquet is diminished about five feet, affording place for sixteen rows of seats. The centre door leading into the auditorium is six feet wide, while to the right and left are six more entrances of a less width. The increased breadth of the aisles traversing the ground-floor of the house, together with an extra amount of lobby room, and the augmenting of the number of doors opening on to the streets, will greatly expedite the exit of large audiences. It is calculated that two thousand five hundred persons can retire from the building, without undue haste, in from three to four minutes.

The balcony will contain four hundred and eighty-four seats, and the parquet four hundred and thirty-six. The chairs introduced are of a new and improved pattern, a shade wider than of old, and equally comfortable in other respects. The frame-work is iron; the covering crim-on plush.

The box-tier comprises a magnificent foyer (twenty feet by sixty), looking out on Irving Place, a lobby corresponding with that on the ground floor, two large dressing-rooms for ladies, hat-rooms, &c. The ceiling is eighteen feet high.

The gallery within the auditorium is supported by iron columns, eight inches in diameter, of an ornamental pattern. The front or face of the circle is richly embellished with carved woodwork, painted in buff and white, relieved with gold. This tier comprises fifty-five loges, three rows deep, those opening on to the lobby being separated from the others by the customary passage way. Above the back row of boxes there is a novel feature styled a mezzanine tier. This is a sort of shelf, the area of which is occupied by twenty-two small boxes (to hold four persons each), all opening on to a gallery over the lobby with which it connects by stairs toward either extremity. The mezzanine boxes command the best view of the house, and will be much sought after, not only for this reason, but because the occupants can see everybody else, while remaining unobserved themselves. Iron balustrades, neatly ornamental in design enclose the box fronts and the outer gallery. The family circle, or third tier, is planned to accommodate seven hundred and fifty sitters and half as many more standers.

There are no less than twenty-eight proscenium boxes, accommodating from seven to ten persons each, and together about two hundred and fifty. These are arranged in four tiers, measuring twenty-eight feet front by fifty in altitude. The first, second and third tiers comprise three apartments each, and the fourth has five. The first tier connects with the balcony circle, the two immediately above it with the box, or dress circle, and the last with the family circle.

Mr. Thomas R. Jackson is the architect and contractor.

The grand Bal de l'Opera takes place at the Academy of Music, Friday, March 1, and inaugurates Maretzek's tenure of that establishment.

The opera season commences Thursday, March 7th. The company is large and capable—in fact, a triple company. There are seven prima donnas, Clara Louise Kellogg, Carmen Poch, Fannie Natali Testa, Amelia M. Hauch, Antoinetta Ronconi, Stella Bonheur and Euphrosyne Parepa. The first six are known to the opera, and admired and applauded. The last named is the distinguished vocalist, whose concerts have made a new era in music throughout the country, and who, in making her appearance on the lyric stage, challenges the enthusiasm of every lover of music. Madame Parepa has, probably, no superior in the world, and when she takes the role of Norma or Donna Anna the new Academy will seem beggarly in size.

What the Piano said to Perabo.

A silent, powerless form I stand,
Fine strung and cunningly contrived,
My cold keys wait a Master's hand,
Skillful to weave the spell derived
From mighty ones, whose living thought,
And mystic chords of heart and life,
Were with their written scores inwrought,
'Mid joys intense, or passion's strife.
O young Interpreter, once more
Their grand, immortal gifts are mine,
As, from the vast, eternal shore,
Those viewless spirits move with thine,
And through thy touch the list'ner hears
The harmonies of other spheres.

Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

II.

[The following Abstract of the earlier Chapters of Thayer's book we translate from a review of it in the Zeitung of Beethoven's native city, Bonn.]

MUSIC IN BONN DURING THE LAST CENTURY AND THE YOUTH OF BEETHOVEN.

The last but three of the Electors of Cologne, having their residence in Bonn, was Joseph Clement (1689-1724). He was of the Bavarian house; obtained secure possession of his dominion through the support of Frederic III. of Brandenburg; but afterwards, owing to his taking the part of France in the Spanish war of succession, he lived nine years in exile at Valenciennes. He had great interest in music and even tried his own hand as a composer; and indeed, according to his naive confession, as he neither knew the notes himself, nor had any sort of understanding of music, he took all that he composed "from good masters, whose musical things please me." He maintained a Capelle of (since 1698) 20 members, at the head of which stood Johann Christoph Petz as Capellmeister (until 1705), a man not unknown in that time as an opera composer. The Capelle, without its director, followed the Elector into exile. After his return it was enlarged and a formal statute was issued (July 19, 1719) concerning the obligations of the musicians and their superiors, which Thayer communicates in full. At that time the Baron von Hohenkirchen was Intendant of the Electoral court music; the "Singmeister," that is to say the Director of all the church music, was the Canon Le Teneur; the secular vocal music was led by Donnini, the instrumental music by the Concertmeister Lambert. Altogether they consisted of 18 vocalists, 17 instrumentalists, 6 court oboists and 6 court trumpeters and kettle-drummers. In Church processions the court musicians appeared in their own uniform. In the Electoral palace there were two rooms devoted to music, one for concerts and the keeping of the instruments, the other for the library.

Elector Clement Augustus (1724-61), the last of the Bavarian race, that jovial prince, whose amiability and humor lived in the memory of the people of Bonn long after his death, and of whose love of splendor many a building of the city and its suburbs even now bears witness, also gave especial fostering care to music among the objects which were to enhance the brilliancy of his court. While he continued generally the arrangements of his predecessor, he strove, by the acquisition of important forces and by brilliant performances, to gain new respect and honor for his court music. Under him too we find the relations firmly regulated; the number of the musicians, the establishment for the court music is distinctly fixed; extraordinary cases only, for example the appointment of a couple of Italian female singers, create any exception in the latter regard. At first a musician regularly served for a certain period as accessist; after proof of his capacity followed his permanent appointment as "Hofmusicus" (court musician), with a for the most part very meagre salary according to our ideas; as such he was held to service alike in the church, in concerts and in the theatre. Among the names of the musicians under Clement Augustus the Italian element prevails. His first capellmeister was Trevisani, who died in 1732; he was followed by Donnini, who held the place for 20 years; with him was Zopis, vice-capellmeister from 1745; and the violoncellist dall' Abaco, who was also active as composer, held from 1735 the place of Director of the Chamber music. After Donnini's death Zudoli became Capellmeister (1753-60); the director of the chamber music and chamber composer at the same time was Joseph Carl Gottwald. Among the musicians who were appointed under this reign and whose names Thayer mentions, so far as they were to be found, are several who partly excite an interest in themselves, and partly appear afterwards in relations with the Beethoven family or otherwise; thus: Haveck, Kiechler, Van den Eede (Beethoven's teacher on the organ, appointed in 1729, died 1782); Anton Raaff, the highly celebrated Tenor, born in the neighborhood of Vilipp and first appointed at Bonn in 1736; Johann Ries, father of Franz Ries, at first court trumpeter, then (since 1754) court violinist; Johann Peter Salomon, appointed 1758, the famous violin-player, who lived at last in London.

But among all these musicians in the time of Clement Augustus, no one excites our interest in a higher degree than LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, the grandfather of our master, who was in Bonn from 1732. He was born in 1712 in Antwerp, where descendants of one branch of the family are still living. From all appearances he had been carefully educated in music. At an early age, in consequence of an unknown family quarrel, he left the paternal house and, after filling the position for a short time of a Phonascus in Louvain (1731), he turned his steps toward Bonn; whether called there or by good luck, is uncertain. Already in March 1733 the Elector appointed him court-musician (bass singer) with a salary of 400 florins; a few months later the young man of twenty married Maria Josepha Poll, who was but a little younger. He seems to have been not the only one of his family who chose Bonn for a home; at the same time with him appears a Cornelius van Beethoven as tallow-candle-furnisher for the Court, &c., who died in 1764 leaving no offspring. Of several children of Ludwig van Beethoven only one son, JOHANN, lived. He was born in 1739 or 1740. He too was destined to be a musician; at the age of 12 he took part in the singing service; at his humble petition he was accepted as court singer in 1756; according to his father's statement he was also "capable at the violin." A short time before Clement's death the father had the disappointment of seeing the place of Capellmeister, vacated by the death of Zudoli, and which had been promised to him, given to a favorite of the Elector, the young violin-player Touchemoulin, who however only remained in possession of it until the death of the Elector.

As it regards the fostering of music itself under this reign, there was unfortunately little to be found; a couple of text books, luckily got hold of, show that both secular and sacred dramatic representations occurred, belonging, as we must infer from the names of the composers and the language, to the Italian operatic and oratorio style. By the building of the theatre (completed about 1750) these performances had acquired a suitable locality.

Clement Augustus was succeeded by Maximilian Frederic, Count Königseck-Rothenfels (1764-84), whose reign reaches far into Beethoven's life time. The lavish expenditure of his predecessor and the debts thereby incurred brought with them the necessity of great curtailments, which the Minister von Belderbusch carried through consistently and strictly. This also affected music and the theatre; among others the young Capellmeister Touchemoulin suffered a considerable reduction of his salary and resigned in consequence. And now Ludwig van Beethoven in an humble petition reminded the court of the promises that had been made to him, and of the services he had already rendered in supplying the place temporarily, and accordingly, on the 16 July, 1761, he was made Electoral Court Capellmeister. His position was an influential one, but at the same time laborious. Besides conducting the music, he had, like his predecessors, to watch over the personal relations of the musicians, to report their doings, to investigate dissensions between them. Thus, on one occasion the singer Fräulein Schwachover (afterwards Frau Delombre) opposed his orders in the rehearsal, and he was obliged to procure an Electoral command to fortify his authority. Besides these duties he had also, as his commission expressly stated, to hold on to his position as bass singer; we know that, to the end of his life, he appeared in important bass parts with great applause. Along with these accounts of his professional exertions it is amusing to hear, that the worthy gentleman also (like other citizens of Bonn at that time) carried on a little wine business on his own account, and profitably too; for the good circumstances in which he lived could not be based upon his musical earnings merely. But this business was a sad fatality for him and his descendants: his wife became a victim to drink, and had finally to be put into a cloister in Cologne; his son Johann inherited the unfortunate propensity, which so overmastered him, that it laid the foundation for the precarious and troubled family circumstances in which the young Beethoven grew up. The old Capellmeister, who lived until about 1767 in the Rheingasse, No. 934, and then in the Bonngasse near the Gudenauer Hof, died at Christmas 1773. He was a powerful, worthy looking man, and stood in high esteem.

JOHANN VAN BEETHOVEN, the father of the great LUDWIG, had, as we have said, been appointed court musician (tenor singer) since 1756, but only in 1764 began to receive pay at the rate of 100 thalers. Besides that, he gave instruction, and probably in his earlier days was valued as a teacher; pupils were in fact sent to him officially. On the strength of this position he married, in 1767, Magdalena Kewerich, of Ehrenbreitstein, the young widow of a waiting man named Laym, and who had formerly been a waiting woman herself; not quite to the satisfaction of the father. The housekeeping in common was then dissolved; the son began housekeeping in the rear house of house No. 515 Bonngasse, nearly opposite to his father's dwelling. Here his first two children were born to him: Ludwig Maria (1769), who lived only a few days, and LUDWIG, born probably on the 16th (baptized on the 17th) of December, 1770. Of six children born after him only two brothers lived: Kaspar (born 1774) and Johann (born 1776). Three times the family changed their residence; from the Bonngasse they went to the Triangle, where they lived in 1774; from there to No. 934 Rheingasse, where the parents had already lived and where the younger family dwelt some 10 years, probably till 1785. The last dwelling house of the family until the father's death (1792), which saw therefore in its rooms the growing and developing young master, was the Peretti house, 476 Wenzelgasse, which the Beethovens occupied in common with the Hertel family.

It was thus under favorable outward circumstances that Beethoven came into the world; his grandfather at the head of all the court music; his father likewise appointed court musician, practising in two capacities, looked up to in his earlier days and much sought as a teacher. Alas! circumstances did not remain favorable long. The little Ludwig had just completed his third year when the grandfather died; and the moral weakness of the father, letting him sink deeper and deeper into the inherited vice, robbed him of his respectability and of the possibility of bettering his outward position (his pay did not exceed 200 thalers) and made impossible a beneficial influence on the education of the children,—a want, which the care of an excellent and loving mother could not fully make up for.

We have already anticipated the course of Thayer's narrative; he first makes us acquainted with the rest of the musical events under Max Frederic. To these belong, for example, the departure of Salomon, the appointment of the afterwards esteemed musicians Willmann and Brandt, but especially the appointments which followed the death of Capellmeister Beethoven.

His place as bass singer was given to Joseph Demmer, formerly Cantor in Cologne; but Andreas Luchesi became Capellmeister; he was born in Venetia, had already made himself favorably known by various compositions, particularly dramatic ones, and had come to Bonn with an Italian opera company in 1771. Along with him another Italian, Laetano Mattioli, was appointed Concertmeister, a clever violinist and director; he was born in Venice in 1750. Among the remaining musicians Franz Ries excites our interest (appointed court musician in 1774); so too his sister, Anna Maria Ries, an excellent singer, afterwards the wife of the violinist Drewier; the contra-bassist Paraquin, the 'cellist Heller, and others. But of prominent importance was the appointment of Christian Gottlob Neeff as court organist in the place of van den Eede, which occurred in 1781. Born in Chemnitz, a pupil of J. A. Hiller, and already favorably known as a composer and writer, he had come to Bonn in 1779 as musical director with Grossmann's theatrical company, and in a short time had won such regard there that, although a Protestant, he was called into the Electoral service and, in spite of many intrigues, kept his place until the end of the Electorate.

Thayer also tells us all that could be found out about the performances in Bonn under Max Frederic. Among the operas produced after 1763 the Italian predominated; the names Galluppi and Piccini are the most frequently met with. There were no regular Concerts; on festival occasions "Academies" were held in the palaces at Bonn or Poppelsdorf. The musicians and singers had always to do duty in the church as well as in the theatre. The year 1778, Beethoven's eighth year, marks an important chapter in the history of the Bonn theatre. At that time Max Frederic induced the famous directors, Grossmann and Helmuth, to come with a company to Bonn; he wished to raise "the German drama to a school of morals for his people." The new company contained excellent talents; it will suffice to name Grossmann's step-daughter, FredERICA Flittner, afterwards famous as Frau Unzelmann. Besides the spoken dramas, among which we meet the best pieces of the literature, there came upon the stage in the course of the next years a considerable number of operas, mostly French (by Gretry, Monsigny, Philidor, Dalayrac), also some Italian and German; Bonn may boast that Mozart's "Seraglio" came upon its stage very soon after its first production in Vienna (winter of 1782-3). The catalogues even mention a native of Bonn, Captain D'Anthoine, as the composer of an opera. The management of the enterprise passed finally into the hands of the energetic wife of Grossmann, as he himself conducted the theatre at Frankfort.

It was this company that brought the two most important teachers of the young Beethoven to Bonn, Pfeiffer as actor and Neeff as musical director. The former, an unsteady nature, but of good musical capacity, lived during his year's stay in Bonn (1779-80) with the Beethoven family in the Rheingasse, and instructed the boy in piano-playing, not at regular hours, but as his mood impelled him; but Beethoven was afterwards conscious of being much indebted to him. Besides him and after him he received from a friend of the house, the young court musician Rovatini, some instruction on the violin and viola; both to be sure only carried on what the father had already begun. But from about 1781 Neeff became Beethoven's principal teacher in piano-playing as well as in thorough-bass; and the boy's intercourse with him was in so far a furtherance, that he frequently took his master's place in his official duties, both at the piano, in the theatre, and at the Court organ, and thus at a very early age it gave him an opportunity to exercise his powers in his own way. But in organ-playing the boy had received his first instruction through the old Van den Eede, and, according to another tradition, from the organist of the Franciscan Convent, brother Willibald Koch. This frequent change of teachers may not have always operated favorably upon the uniformity of his progress, at least he complained once afterwards in Czerny's presence of the insufficiency of his earliest instruction; "but," he added, "I had talent for music."

At all events it was a favorable circumstance, that the young Beethoven grew up into a firmly organized community of sterling singers and musicians, to which his grandfather and father had belonged as active members; and so his rapidly unfolding talents qualified him already as a boy to play a part among them. But also among the residents of Bonn at that time a young talent could find manifold incitement and frequent opportunity to hear good music or to take a part in it. The Counsellor Johann Gottfried von Mastiaux was looked up to in the city as an excellent connoisseur and protector of artists; weekly concerts took place in his house, and all musicians found a kindly welcome there. Besides him, the Minister Belderbusch, the Countess Hatzfeld, the Frau Hofrätin von Belzer, Captain von Schall, Counsellor Altstalten, the Facius family, and others, are named as persons who, either as practical musicians or through their interest in music, coöperated in raising its condition.

In such surroundings, Thayer's account of which is further enriched by a short description of the town as it then was, Ludwig van Beethoven grew up as a shy and monosyllabic boy, in the fear of a father, whose severity had for its only end the securing of outward success, without any possibility of beneficial influence on the boy's disposition, since it was without higher moral aim. With all the greater love was he attached to his mother, who, from all indications, was an excellent woman both in disposition and domestic capability. She herself suffered under her husband's irregularities, probably sickened under their impression and died an early death (1787). Continual poverty induced the father, who anyhow had a correct recognition of the boy's great talent, to expend all his zeal on its development at the most rapid rate possible, for no other reason but to make him soon available for the bettering of his condition. Hence he provided early, as we have seen, for many-sided musical instruction, while other intellectual culture was pretty much neglected; in the elementary school, which he attended a few years, the boy does not appear to have distinguished himself. Many and various as were the intellectual interests which moved our master farther on in life, he never received any systematic scientific culture.

Music in Venice.

The special correspondent of an English daily paper has recently written an amusing description of the attempt made by the Venetians to revive the former glories of their opera-house, "La Fenice," which had been long closed. He also gives a short sketch of the musical history of Venice, which is well worth preserving:—

"During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Venice, as a nursery for lyric art, was more renowned than either Rome or Naples, or Milan. The boundless wealth and the inexhaustible good nature of the Venetians led them to crowd their beautiful city with charitable institutions. If we wish to see orphan asylums now in their fullest plenitude—even to redundancy sometimes—we must turn to England, or to the United States; but, two hundred years ago, the Queen of the Adriatic was the most bounteous nursing mother to the fatherless and the destitute to be found the whole world over. The Conservatorio di Musica is a Venetian invention, and in its origin was a purely eleemosynary one, and the musical conservatories of Venice flourished generations before similar establishments were dreamt of in other parts of the Continent. Venice had at one time so many little children under her charge, that, like the old woman who lived in a shoe, she did not know what to do with them. To give them broth without bread, and, whipping them all round, dismiss them to rest, was not a part of her scheme."

To this charitable feeling for the juvenile poor of the population, the writer ascribes the greater part of the musical education and love for the art which exists in Venice:—

"The Most Serene determined, in its wisdom, that the children should all be taught music—vocal if they had any voices, instrumental if they had hands; both if they had one and the other. At least, they argued, he who can play on the fiddle can never starve. The Most Serene went even further. They solved the problem which in this nineteenth century is puzzling us so sorely. They found a suitable and remunerative employment for women. The female orphans were taught to play on the fiddle; yea, even on the piccolo and on the bass viol to boot. The good old professor who comes to me every morning and endeavors to indoctrinate me in the beauties of Italian poetry tells me that when he was young almost every girl in Venice could play on the violoncello. In these genteel days, he adds with a sigh, the possession of such an accomplishment by the damigelle of Venice would be deemed 'shocking.' It is, in truth, difficult to reconcile with your notions of feminine refinement the idea of the adored one of your heart sitting on a three-legged stool, and sawing away at the double bass."

"My professor, I suppose, was born long after the collapse of the Most Serene, and the prevalence of big fiddling among the young ladies of his acquaintance may have been but the dim continuance of an esteemed tradition. Music, however, vocal and instrumental, had been, at one time taught universally and systematically to the children of the poor, both boys and girls. Almost every Italian is a musician born, to begin with—that is to say, he or she has an ear, and sympathy, and taste. Proficiency in the practice of music served to relieve weakly boys from the drudgery of mechanical labor—to enfranchise girls from the abhorrent bondage of the needle. The demand for such proficient was quite equal to the supply, although the Italian operas of London, New York, San Francisco, and St. Petersburg were as yet uncreated. Italy could take as many good performers, male and female, as conservatories of Venice could furnish."

The result of all this musical education was, that the art became fashionable among the rich and great, as well as loved and practised by the poor:—

"The works of the great Venetian masters are full of lutes, haut-boys, sackbuts, and all kinds of psaltery. You never see the wedding guest but you hear the loud bassoon. They were good players themselves, as the great Dutchmen were. When Gerard Douw has finished touching up his pots and pans, he takes up his Stradivarius and discourses sweetly upon it. The bass viol has an honored place by the easel of Palma Vecchio. Giorgione clashes the cymbals, and Titian pinches the chords of the harp. Simple Catholic men, they carry their love for music up to the very heavens. They shew us saints and martyrs sounding the French horn, and angels performing on the big drum. In those bright orchestral days, what a charivari there must have been from the Alps to the Adriatic, and from the Lago Maggiore to the Gulf of Sorrento! Every great noble had a band of "musicianers" in his train. Not a lord but had his chamber singers. Not a lady but had her lute boy. Not municipal solemnity but needed some braying and banging of metallic harmony. The Church had stomach for a whole mine of music; nor in the Venetian fane were female voices banished from the mass, as, from the pathetic Latin lament of the Maestro Rossini to the Pope, we learn that they now are throughout the peninsula."

These halcyon days, however, did not last long. The Republic came to an end, and with it the musical prosperity of Venice began to fade away:—

"The Austrians, it must be admitted, brought with them into Venetia the best military bands that had ever been heard in Italy; but, their waltzes and mazurkas in St. Mark's Place notwithstanding, they contrived to strangle, suffocate and sit down upon the musical profession in their unjustly acquired kingdom. The Scala at Milan, it is true, they never succeeded in destroying. The Conservatory of the capital of Lombardy continued to flourish as a musical university, whither repaired students from all parts of Europe; but music in Venice the Tedeschi utterly ruined."

As a natural consequence the Venetian theatres and opera-house failed in like manner, and it was to repair the credit of their opera-houses and musicians that such great efforts were made to re-open the "Fenice":—

"No sooner" he says, "was the cession of Venetia to Italy talked about last July than the Venetians began to talk about reopening La Fenice. The resuscitation of the famous old house was looked upon as a natural and inevitable consequence of the emancipation of the city. The preparations for the Feast of Liberty went on concurrently. Then the Austrians vanished for good, and it was announced that the Fenice would be opened on the thirty-first of October. Some people thought it would be more loyal and decorous to wait for the arrival of King Victor Emmanuel, and solemnly inaugurated the new era with a gala performance, and the Fenice lit a giorno; but the Venetians were impatient to look upon their beloved opera-house once more, and the thirty-first was adhered to. I heard, for a full fortnight, almost as much bragging and boasting about the primo tenore and the prime donne, and the band and the chorus, and the new scenery, dresses, and decorations, which we were to see by the thirty-first, as before the war we used to hear about what nostri prodi meant to do in the Quadrilateral, and nostre camicie rosse in the Tyrol."

The writer gives an amusing account of the arrival of some of the artists who happened to put up at his hotel:

"One night, very late, a gondola arrived at the Hotel Victoria; a vast quantity of luggage, a lady of a certain age and another of an uncertain age, the former being the mamma of the latter, were discharged therefrom; and the shrill tones of a female voice were heard in the marble halls inquiring "La prima mima? Dov'è la prima mima?" It was the seconda mima, the second pet of the ballet, who had arrived, and to whom the first mima had given rendezvous at the Victoria. I call her age uncertain, because in stature she did not appear to be much over nine, whereas in agility she was nineteen, and in facial expression ninety. The next day came the primo tenore, who was stout, and a sufferer from the toothache, they said. He retired to his apartments and rang the bell up till one in the morning, demanding mint, tea, chloroform, laudanum, onion-peel, kreosote, tobacco, cloves, cotton wool, and other remedies for his ailment. We were joined, however, at the table d'hôte by the prima donna, who was thickly swathed in shawls, and the tip of whose nose—which was about the only part of her person visible—did not look quite so young as it might have done. The footlights, however, made a wonderful difference in these play-acting folks; and it is certain that their profession is a very trying one for the complexion."

The rehearsal is described with great minuteness, and the performance fully justified the expectation formed from it:—

"The long-expected Thirty-first arrived, and the Fenice was opened. The house was not at any time during the evening more than half-full. The foreigners in Venice had been cozened into paying exorbitant prices for their seats, but the Venetians had obtained their tickets at the ordinary tariff, and not a tithe of what may be considered good society in Venice was present at the Fenice at all. A sufficient number of cognoscenti were, however, in evidence to deliver an authoritative verdict that the entire performance was atrociously bad, and, from the beginning of the second scene, to 'goose' it most thoroughly. The whole auditorium, indeed, reeked with the odor of sage and onions. The 'goose' was complete. All the predictions of my Milanese friends were verified. When the young lady in the sky-blue satin inexpressibles had recited two bars, the pitiées began to blow into lute-keys and to whistle profane airs. 'Fal-de-rat-tit sang Fol-de-rol-lol, but scarce had he done when a row began'; that is to say, that nobody would listen to the stout tenor with the toothache. As for the baritone, they made light of the pallor of his countenance and turned his jack-boots into derision. It was discovered that the prima donna was fifty-five years of age—I will not be so ungallant as to mention her name—and that she had been 'goosed' at the San Samuele in the year '48. After this the cause of Un Ballo in Maschera was hopeless."

Theatre-goers in Venice have evidently something in common with the same order of beings in England, for he continues:—

"The disturbance towards the end of the first act had grown so tumultuous—there was such a storm of fischietti, of screeching, hooting, yelling, stamping, and roaring "Fuori! fuori!"—that "Doldrum the manager," or whatever the impresario's name may be, had, in his opera hat and opera tights, to advance to the foot-lights, and submit the terms of a compromise. He proposed that the first act should be allowed to conclude; next that the National Hymn should be sung; then that the ballet should be given; and, finally, that the remainder of Un Ballo in Maschera should be presented. The audience demurred to the totality of these terms. They were willing to hear the hymn, and see the ballet, but they would not hear any more opera; but when the dolorous man in jack-boots essayed once more a piteous stave, he was met with such a universal howl of 'Basta! basta!' 'Enough! enough!' that the blue cotton velvet curtain dropped, as though of its own volition, on the painful scene, and the suggeritore or prompter ducked his head, as though to evade the storm of orange-peel, or potatoes, or half-pence, or some other form of annihilation which might probably be directed to his dress by the outraged amateurs of Venice. Nobody threw anything, however. There was no need to call in the police. The people, so far as the present historian is concerned, were, towards eleven p.m., 'left hooting'; but I am told by more persistent spectators, who did not leave the theatre until one in the morning, that after the hymn had been sung and the ballet danced, the fag-end of Un Ballo in Maschera did, in a most disjointed and dragged manner, wriggle itself, in the midst of fearful opprobrium and scorn, to an unhonored close. Such was the great fiasco of the Fenice on the 31st October, 1866. I think they had better have kept the theatre closed for another eight years than have opened it in this shabby fashion, and with this worn-out troupe; and if the management intend to give Victor Emmanuel, on the grand gala night when he goes to the theatre in state, a repetition of the Ballo in Maschera, it will certainly be a pretty dish to set before a king."

Joachim and Madame 'Schumann.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

Many amateurs among us can still remember the astonishment created at one of the Philharmonic Concerts, as far back as 1844, by a boy of thirteen, in the violin concerto of Beethoven. This boy had been recommended to Mr. Sterndale Bennett, then a Philharmonic director, by no less an authority than Mendelssohn, in a letter full of the warmest eulogies, and terminating as follows:—"Although he is scarcely more than twelve years of age, I look upon him as one of my most intimate and dearest friends," or words to that effect. There is no betraying of confidence in citing this, inasmuch as the letter has been unreservedly communicated. Of all artists whom we know, Herr Joachim is the one who most entirely forgets himself in the music he has to play. It is never Joachim, but always the author, be that author J. S. Bach or Beethoven (his special favorites), Haydn or Mozart, Spohr or Mendelssohn, Tartini, Viotti, or Paganini, with all of whose works he is thoroughly familiar. So little does this model artist obtrude his own individuality that it is not until his performance has come to an end that the thought strikes us how wonderful it has been. Even in the midst of the overwhelming plaudits that so frequently greet him after one of his marvellous feats, he seems to think, if we may judge by his manner, that Joachim himself has really no claim to applause, and that the composer—for Herr Joachim rarely attempts in public the works of living masters, unless they be his own—should come out of the grave and take what is solely his due. But the sobriety and modesty of his play are by no means the only fine qualities of Herr Joachim. As a virtuoso he stands apart from his contemporaries. His mechanism is prodigious, and he lends himself to every difficulty with ease, whether it be in a study by Paganini, a fantasia by Ernst, a fugue by J. S. Bach (perhaps the most trying of all,) a presto by Mendelssohn, or a "posthumous" quartet by Beethoven. Each comes to him readily; and such consummate mastery does he possess that we can scarcely believe that what he is playing is not the easiest thing in the world. His repose is as remarkable as his naturally sustained as when he is engaged on a adagio by Haydn or Mozart, which, though calling largely upon the expressive powers, must from the point of view of mere mechanism be to such an artist mere diversion. Nor is there any weak point in his mechanism. As J. B. Cramer said of Dreyschöck, and a contemporary the other day of Arabella Goddard, Herr Joachim "has no left hand." He has, however, two right hands; and the graceful and splendid sweep of the "bow" over the strings can only be compared with the extraordinary skill and tenacity with which the strings are pressed into utterance of the notes. His double-stopping and staccato (not to venture further into musical technicalities) are as sure and satisfactory as his single-stopping and legato—the last being the most perfectly smooth and well balanced we can call to mind. Then for energy, for rapid execution, accompanied by unflinching articulation, Herr Joachim is unrivalled; and last, but not least, his expression is always healthy and vigorous. There is no morbid sentimentality in his play. He has a clear disdain for the artificial subterfuge of "rallentando," wherein (as in other peculiarities) he closely resembles Mendelssohn. No slackening or hastening of the time is demanded from his accompanists by Herr Joachim, who, when he avails himself of the "tempo rubato," does so on the Emersonian principle of "compensation." Then, with him, accent and rhythm go hand in hand, and every phrase counts for its intrinsic value. He does not attempt to make brass stand substitute for worthier metal, but instinctively gives to every idea its positive expression. A composer may be thoroughly persuaded that not a feature in his work will pass unheeded should Herr Joachim be persuaded to introduce it to the public; but no composer would be justified in expecting from this great performer any of those glittering shams by aid of which, in too many instances, tinsel, in the eyes of the uninitiated, is made to pass for gold. Happily, Herr Joachim delights in promulgating a taste for the genuine masters of the art. With them he communes as a familiar spirit, and in their cause he is both a preacher and a prophet. In these cynical and semi-sceptical times it seems hard to believe that an artist of the kind is possible. All the more, then, should musicians and amateurs of music rejoice in the existence of such a representative man.

Herr Joachim has been playing all sorts of good things at the Monday Popular Concerts. Beginning with the great "posthumous quartet," in B flat, of Beethoven, he followed this up with the same master's quartet in C, third of the renowned set of three dedicated to the Russian Prince Rasoumowsky; with Mendelssohn's early quartet in A minor (Op. 13, his first, though published as his second); with Spohr's double quartet in E minor, the first of five masterpieces of similar construction; with Mendelssohn's quartet in E flat, Op. 44, which alone would have placed its composer side by side with Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; and with three of the finest quintets in existence—Beethoven in C major (Op. 29); Mozart in G minor, the one which so impressed the impressionable mind of Schubert; and Mendelssohn in B flat major—Herr Joachim's performance of the adagio in which recalled the best days of the much regretted Ernst, unequalled in the execution of slow movements. All these compositions have been made welcome and delightful by Herr Joachim to the crowds that besiege St. James's Hall at the Monday Popular Concerts. He has played, moreover, sonatas for violin and piano with Mr. Hallé and Mme. Arabella Goddard, and, among the rest, the great sonata in C minor of Beethoven, with Mme. Goddard, one of the most superb performances, on both hands, that could well be imagined.

About the trios and other concerted pieces in which Herr Joachim has taken part we have not space to add a word. Enough that his advent among us has again thrown a lustre over our musical season which it is to be hoped may for years be a periodical phenomenon.

Mme. Schumann also has come, to rejoice the hearts of the Schumannites. And really to hear this famous pianist play the music of her late husband, whom some people want us to believe a second Beethoven, or, still more, a continuer of Beethoven, is enough to make any one a Schumannite. Talk of enthusiasm! Here is more than enthusiasm. No wife could be more completely her husband's better half. Mme. Schumann, the pianist, is the better half of Robert Schumann's music. Into compositions that are not Schumann's she hardly enters with the same loving self-denial. On the contrary, while playing Schumann she makes her hearers think of nothing but Schumann, just as Herr Joachim merges his own individuality in that of the author he interprets; in playing other masters she forces us to think exclusively of herself. At the same time there is no denying that Mme. Schumann is something worth thinking about. That she is not what Clara Wieck used to be must be charged to time. Clara Wieck was one of the foremost classical pianists of her day, as Giulia Grisi was one of the foremost dramatic singers of hers; but players, like singers, can only shine for a period. The sun rises, and we have dawn; the sun glows, and we have noon; the sun sets, and we have evening. Mme. Schumann is in her twilight; but what a twilight it is! Every now and then one might imagine the meridian come back. In any case a lady who has earned a world-wide fame such as she earned when Clara Wieck—a fame honorably supported when she became Mme. Schumann, and since the regretted death of her gifted husband still undauntedly maintained—deserves a hearty welcome from every amateur who loves music for music's sake. A hearty welcome she received in England two years ago, at these same Monday Popular Concerts, when there was a programme made up exclusively of her husband's music. A hearty welcome she again experienced the other night, when she played with indomitable energy Beethoven's sonata in D minor, Op. 31 (No. 2) a work well calculated for the manifestation of those peculiarities that, belonging to her from the first, still exist in their pristine force, and can only fail to evoke the sympathy of unimpressionable hearers. The same indomitable energy was exhibited by Mme. Schumann in the pianoforte part of Beethoven's E flat trio, Op. 70, one of the Erdödy set of two, in which she enjoyed the coöperation of Herr Joachim and of Signor Piat, as violin and violoncello. But still more interesting to those who love the music of Schumann, and wish it to make progress in this country, was Mme. Schumann's performance of the pianoforte part in two of Schumann's romances (Op. 94), with violin as principal instrument, Herr Joachim taking the violin. This was simply perfection.

The Saturday afternoon concerts having begun, Mme. Schumann was naturally enlisted to take part in them, and at the very last gave just such a reading of Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata (Op. 53) as of the one in D minor already mentioned. In the "Waldstein" sonata her energy is overpowering, and at the termination one can hardly help thinking of the singular panegyric bestowed upon it by the Muscovite Beethovenist, W. de Lenz, in the wild book entitled, Beethoven et ses Trois Styles, in which he strives to exalt his hero above and at the expense of all other musicians:—"Cette sonate frappe deux coups, —mais quels coups!" The "deux coups" are meant to signify the allegro con brio and the rondo allegretto moderato, of which the sonata principally consists, the brief adagio that intervenes serving merely as a bridge to connect one with the other. Had Lenz heard Madame Schumann play the "Waldstein" he would have characterized the sonata itself: "Deux coups—mais quel coups!" At this same concert she enraptured all hearers in her husband's quintet, Op. 44 (E flat), but into which she infuses extraordinary life. It is a pity that Schumann was not an Oriental. He could then have had five wives; and supposing (which is natural enough) each an enthusiast for his music, the other instruments might have been handled with the same enthusiasm, and an ideal performance of his quintet have been the result. Lady violinists and lady violoncellists have not been wanting in the present century.

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, FEB. 25. Since my letter of Feb. 2, concerts have multiplied. The first in point of time was the "Concert de Salon" by Messrs. KUNKEL and HAHN. The programmes of the first (Feb. 5th) and second concerts (Feb. 19) are given in abstract to save space. Of piano music we heard: Sonata in D major, for two pianos, and Sonata in C major, op. 14, for four hands, by Mozart (Messrs. Charles and Jacob Kunkel); Intermezzi, op. 4, book 2, by Schumann; Polonaise, op. 22, Berceuse, op. 57, Polonaise in C sharp minor, op. 26, by Chopin; Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 10, by Liszt (all played by Mr. Charles K.) and some Polkas by Mr. Charles Kunkel (Messrs. Charles and Jacob K.) in the place of a Rondo for two pianos by Chopin (op. 76, posthume) the one Grand being out of tune. For Piano and Strings were performed: Sonata in A major, op. 6, by Gade, for piano and violin (Messrs. Ch. K. and Hahn), and Sonata, for piano and violoncello, op. 5, No. 1, in F major, by Beethoven (Messrs. Ch. K. and Mich. Brand); the Quartet in E flat major, op. 16, by Beethoven, and the Quintet in E flat major, op. 44, by Schumann (Messrs. Ch. K., Hahn, Strobel, Schwabel and M. Brand). Mr. Hahn played two movements of the 7th Concerto, op. 76, by De Beriot.

Fine programmes. The two Messrs. Kunkel have astonishing execution, and play with the most scrupulous purity and neatness. Their elocution, however, is cold, except in bravura pieces. The best played piece was undoubtedly that by Liszt. None of the pieces by Chopin were played with that delicacy of sentiment, that poetic ardor necessary to an artistic rendering. The Berceuse was loud enough to wake up all the babies of the neighborhood. The Sonatas by Mozart, as far as we heard them, were smoothly performed. Mr. Charles Kunkel excels in producing a strong, round, clear tone, such as makes a good run brilliant; and in that evanescent, zephyr-like tone-breathing, which Gottschalk uses for his piano passages. The Schumann Intermezzi were played quite well, some of them very well. So was the Gade Sonata. The Quintet by Schumann was well performed, Mr. Hahn, however, lacking breadth and nobility of tone, especially noticeable in the "un poco largamente." In the Violoncello Sonata and the Quartet by Beethoven, the din of the Piano drowned the Strings, sometimes to a painful degree. Mr. Brand plays very well, and has made astonishing progress. He has a bright future before him, and if he studies classical models, he will in a short time be a fine artist. There is much nobleness and breadth in his playing, which sometimes reminds me of your Wulf Fries.

On the 6th, 13th and 20th of Feb. the Symphony Concerts took place, the first of which was noticed in my last. The hall is excellent as to acoustics and was well filled. Thus far we have had two opening overtures (Freyshütz and Oberon); pieces from Beethoven's 5th, Mozart's "Jupiter," Haydn's 5th (in E flat), Symphonies; Wedding and Coronation marches, quite a good Quartet for Cabinet Organ, Piano, Violin and Violoncello by Gounod (from his Faust); Waltzes by Labitzky and Gungl; for closing Overtures the Merry Wives of Windsor and La Dame Blanche. Of the last concert on the 20th we cannot speak to-day, having mislaid the programme. The orchestra is improving; there is phrasing; but there is not yet a proper proportion between the brass instruments and wood and strings. Crescendos and decrescendos are often rather abrupt, and pianos sometimes little heeded. We hope to see soon one complete Symphony on the programme; pieces from this and pieces from that one are rather tantalizing, but a whole Symphony is satisfactory. Still it is a good thing and pleasurable, to hear orchestral music again. Our sincere thanks to Mr. L. C. Hopkins, without whose liberality and love for the art we might have sighed for your afternoon concerts yet many winters to come.

Of Mr. G. ANDRES's concert, Monday, Feb. 11, we only heard the first three numbers. The Schubert Trio was unfortunately curtailed, but played finely, Mr. Eich alone marring the performance, by being habitually an eighth of a note too high. It was a great pity, for really his playing was fervid and poetic. Mr. Andres knows how to draw from the keys a most beautiful, sympathetic tone, and his selections (No. 3) "Etude de Style," by A. Kallak, "Spring's Welcome" and Fantaisie Militaire by himself, and Chopin's Berceuse, were highly enjoyable. We make one suggestion: sometimes the single bass-note is too weak to bear the weight of superadded harmonies, melodies and embellishments; a little more strength in the little finger of the left hand would relieve the uncertainty and give the proper foundation. This suggestion does not apply to Mr. A. alone, but indeed to the majority of pianists whom we have heard. The immense difficulties to be performed in modern piano music in the middle and higher octaves by both hands, seem so to absorb the attention of the players, that the proper balance is lost, and as a result the music sometimes sounds "top-heavy."

The MAENNER-CHOR opened their seventh Opera season with "Undine," which went off finely—indeed often giving real delight, excellent in choruses and often surprisingly good in the solo parts. Miss Lohheide as Undine plays and sings admirably, and Mr. Goldsticker as Hans, the butler, does his part as well as any buffo can do it. Mr. Curth deserves great praise for the beauty of his singing and his acting. The scenery and the orchestra were also good. We anticipate much pleasure from Oberon. The second representation of Undine came off yesterday, with the spurious label: "Sacred Concert." We were prevented from attending.

Is not this doing well for Cincinnati? Indeed music enough for three weeks. We were sorry that we could not go to a concert which Madame Rive gave with her pupils. The lady, who sometimes sings at the Cecilia Concerts, has so fine a voice, sings with so much taste and poetic feeling, that to hear her is a pleasure. She is very successful as a teacher, and has educated some excellent singers.

March 4. On Friday we heard Oberon. The choruses went very well, the soli were less good, which, considering the greater difficulty, is easily explained. The orchestra played the overture beautifully, and proved that they can play with nice shading. As to the accompaniments, we enter a solemn protest. They were all too loud, and drowned Sir Huon's part almost entirely. Miss Loheyde (Rezia) in the slower airs was fine, the grander ones were sung too high in part; and partly there was too much forcing of the voice instead of legitimate, smooth delivery. Miss Goldsticker (Fatima) sang her part exceedingly well. Her voice, fresh and luscious, promises great things. Both these ladies acted very well. The same ought to be said of Mr. Curth (Sherasmin), who likewise excelled in singing. The Maenner-Chor deserves great praise for the energy with which yearly two operas are prepared, thus for a few nights at least calling up reminiscence of olden times. The scenery and properties in general were splendid.

The fourth and fifth Symphony Concerts took place Feb. 20 and 27. We heard for Overtures: La Dame Blanche, Zampa and Semiramide; besides the important Robespierre Overture by Litolff, in which the brasses, unfortunately, were overpowering. In the fourth concert parts of Haydn's B-flat (No. 2) and Mozart's Jupiter Symphony were heard; and the fifth gave us the great pleasure of hearing an entire symphony (E flat) by Haydn again. The Tannhäuser March went quite well; the Athalia March (under direction of Mr. Hahn) was altogether too slow and therefore ineffective. The Venus Reigen Waltz by Gungl, however, (under the same director) was well played. Of soli we had one by Mr. Schneider (Scherzo in B minor by Chopin) which was poetically conceived, though the execution was not perfect. It was wonderful to see an orchestra of some twenty odd performers quietly sitting on their chairs, while an artist had to turn the leaves of his piece himself. But for this untoward circumstance, some of the bass-notes which were missing, would undoubtedly have come out well, and we hope to hear Mr. Schneider to better advantage next time. He has the true enthusiasm for what is noble, and his playing gives pleasure by the warmth of his feeling, and promise of still greater excellence in its mechanical part. Mr. M. Brand played the Serenade finely, giving much pleasure.

A concert by Mrs. Rice is said to have been very fine. We were unfortunately prevented from attending.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN. The Mass, in D, of our countryman, Mr. JOHN K. PAINE—his first work of the kind—was brought out, under his own direction, in the Sing-Akademie, on the 16th of last month, and apparently with marked success. Our readers will be interested in the following account of the event, which we translate from the Berlinische Nachrichten; it gives the impression of one of the first of the Berlin critics:

"The performance of a new Mass is always an event worthy of consideration. That of the newest one, by JOHN PAINE, is attended by such peculiar circumstances, as to claim a heightened interest. The composer, American by birth—a rarity in itself; educated here in Germany in German music, the pupil of our esteemed musician, the Organ virtuoso HAUPT (to whom the printed Mass is dedicated)—all this claims our nearer regard. But what is still more: Mr. Paine, who at present holds a position as musical director in the University at Cambridge, North America, undertook this long journey in order to bring out his work first here in Berlin, as it were the cradle of his culture. This surely is as much a recognition of German Art, as it is a testimonial to the way in which the musica sacra is cherished and appreciated here; and indeed a flattering compliment to the critical judgment of the public and the press. Coming back over the sea with warm, full heart and with a certain home feeling as it were, Mr. Paine might have expected that one of our institutions, capable of performing a Mass, would undertake his or assist in bringing it out. But no; insurmountable obstacles and difficulties presented themselves, such as occur only in the art of music and oppose themselves to any speedy development of an artist. The writer of this report was the first one who, when Mr. Paine laid these difficulties before him, advised him to put his hand to the work himself. Of the same view were other artists; especially Prof. Sieber and Music-director Wieprecht were eager in their encouragement.

"And so, with the artistic aid of many friends of vocal music, ladies and gentlemen, with considerable expense to be sure, after a series of rehearsals, the Mass gradually approached the day of performance, until this could be fixed for the 16th of Feb., in the hall of the Singakademie. And now, thanks to the perseverance of all who took part as well as of the composer himself, and with the help of Liebig's orchestra, of the estimable solo-singers Fräulein Strahl, Frau Wüstr, Herr Geyer and Herr Zachiesche, and a splendid chorus, the Missa Solemnis was so fairly launched, that with our whole soul we can congratulate Mr. Paine on the final achievement of his purpose. A particularly musical audience, including nearly all the distinguished musicians of our city, attended the performance, which took two full hours.

If we consider the total impression, we can without contradiction characterize it as a satisfactory one. The Mass is the work of a musician, who is justified by earnest study in writing a score like this, peculiarly calculated for the co-operation of the organ. Most of the movements are well planned and well managed. The text is treated according to the traditions of the masters, and we may say with a devout feeling, often a presentiment of the highest. As to finding wholly new ways, to be sure, as to seeking out still stronger contrasts in invention than the greatest masters, especially Bach and Mozart, could do—to this perhaps only a later period of life might lead the artist. Who knows? But we must not forget that this work is a first production, in which an author not seldom does and requires too much of a good thing, whereas a master will express only what is necessary, in a concise form. Yet, one may say in general, Paine's Mass is brilliantly effective, especially through its instrumentation, or rather through its masses. Among the better, greater effects we may count the exclamations, for instance the Domine Deus in the second chorus; also the Pleni sunt caeli, while the Kyrie seems to set in too frequently, and the contrast of the Gloria and Pax hominibus is not sharp enough. The Et incarnatus is carefully combined; the Crucifixus has dignity; the Et resurrexit is so solemn, although reminding one of Bach (in his B-minor Mass); the Sanctus again is softly treated, although with a purely subjective comprehension of the words. Through the arts of counterpoint the In gloria Dei Patris, the Et vitam venturi saeculi with a countertheme at the exclamation Amen, and finally the Osanna (rather too long), have value for the connoisseur. On the other hand, the pastoral-like Benedictus, with violin obligato, appeared to us far fetched and not very singable. But the Agnus Dei, especially the concluding portion with the Dona nobis pacem, seemed to us in good keeping, good in sound, so that the last impression was such that the audience broke out into lively demonstrations of applause. At any rate all those who went away too early, some of our colleagues among them, missed many of the best things, which the Mass conceals toward the end.

"Not even the severest judge of Mr. Paine's labor can deny him the success d'estime. For future products of his muse we wish him a sharper file for the solo passages, more concentration in the form of the chorus, more contrasts in invention. The execution in the choral and orchestral parts is to be praised; of the soli, Herr Geyer, of the royal Dom-chor, deserved mention, particularly in the Quoniam (albeit with slight wavering in the orchestra). The Benedictus, already alluded to, imposes a hard task upon the singers, even in the entrances, without being beautiful.

London.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS have been resumed under the direction of Herr Manns. The programme of the 26th ult. comprised Schumann's splendid symphony in B flat, No. 1, and Auber's vivacious overture, Zanetta. The orchestra was also in force in Beethoven's glorious pianoforte concerto in C, No. 4, the eloquent exponent of which was Mme. Arabella Goddard, who right royally maintains her supremacy as a pianist, whether in a chamber composition or the grand instrumental epics of the master minds. It was a graceful act to produce Mr. A. Sullivan's clever overture In Memoriam, which so impressed the Norwich connoisseurs at the autumnal festival. The vocalists were Mlle. Sinico and Fraulein Drasdil. Mr. Sullivan was called for at the close of his work, and Mme. Arabella Goddard had quite an ovation for her brilliant execution.—Queen.

At the concert to-day Schumann's symphony in D minor (No. 3, or No. 4?), Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat (pianist Mme. Schumann), and Mendelssohn's overture, The Hebrides, are included, among other attractive pieces vocal and instrumental. Mme. Schumann is to play solos by Mendelssohn, and Miss Edmonds, Miss Franklin, and Signor Foli, are to sing.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. At the concert this afternoon Herr Pauer is the pianist. Among other things Schubert's piano-forte trio, in E flat (No. 2), will be played for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts. On Monday evening, also for the first time, Herr Joachim will lead the first of two sestets by Herr Brahms (in B flat), for two violins, two violas, and two violoncellos.

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY. Acis and Galatea and Locke's music to Macbeth seem as indissoluble with this Society as Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Mozart's Requiem, or Rossini's Stabat Mater, with the elder association which holds its meetings at Exeter Hall. I wish I could congratulate the choir over which Mr. G. W. Martin presides, but truth compels me to say that more progress might have been manifested than at their latest performance. Wednesday next Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Rossini's Stabat Mater will be given.—Mus. World.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. The directors of the Philharmonic Society have issued a very promising programme for their fifty-fifth season. The concerts are fixed for the Mondays March 11th and 25th, April 8th, May 5th and 20th, June 17th, and July 1. The Society is under the immediate patronage of the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales, who in all probability will honor some of the concerts with their presence, taking as they do a lively interest in the Society's success. With the appointment of the new conductor, Mr. W. G. Cusins, organist to Her Majesty—a professor, who, as a composer, pianist, and violinist, has earned early distinction—a new line of policy, or rather the restoration of the primitive principles on which the institution was based, has been determined upon by the directory, of which Mr. Cusins is a member. It appears that Mr. Sullivan and M. Gounod have been specially engaged to compose new overtures, which will be executed during the series. Moreover, Professor Bennett has promised to complete the symphony, three movements of which were played in 1865, and which required a fourth movement to render it thoroughly orthodox. Now, this policy of the directors takes the wind out of the sails of the rivals of the old society, a rivalry which at first affected to produce novelty, but soon fell back on the old répertoire. Mr. Cusins seems resolved to essay the winning of his spurs as a conductor, for Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Choral Fantasia (the pianoforte in the latter to be played by Mme. Arnheila Goddard), and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," will be included in the schemes.

Symphony Concerts.

The seventh subscription concert of the Harvard Musical Association, March 1, proved as a whole the most enjoyable of any. The employment of three excellent solo artists, besides the now well-drilled, effective orchestra, and the attractive variety of the programme, made it so.

- Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck.
Aria: "Erstarme dich," with Violin Obligato, from the Passion Music.....Bach.
Mrs. J. S. Cary and Carl Rosa.
Violin Concerto, in D, Op. 61. (First movement).
Beethoven.
Carl Rosa.
Rondo, Op. 29, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Mendelssohn.
Ernst Perabo.
Chaconne, for Violin Solo.....Bach.
Carl Rosa.
a. Recitative and Aria: "Deh vieni, non tardar," from "Le Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart.
b. Cradle Song.....Mendelssohn.
Mrs. J. S. Cary.
Symphony, No. 8, in F.....Beethoven.

The sterling old Overture by Gluck had good treatment and was keenly relished. The introduction of an Aria from Bach's Passions-musik (according to St. Matthew) before one of our great concert audiences was a hitherto untried experiment. This melody, full of tears and penitence, tender, sincere, deeply religious, is one of exceeding beauty; large in form and nobly sustained, with nothing feebly sentimental and no trickery of ornament; only such chaste, spontaneous efflorescence as sings along involuntarily in the sympathetic violin obligato part so fervently rendered by CARL ROSA. Indeed all the accompaniment (the string quartet of the orchestra, only colored with bassoons and oboes, which last had to be omitted, Mr. DRESEL supplying some chords on the piano instead) sounds like, what true accompaniment should be, the audible vibration of a surrounding atmosphere in sympathy with the inspiring voice. In this sense, all that contrapuntal imitation, that polyphonic reiteration of the phrase in all parts of the harmony, of which Bach is the best type, and which to the superficial sense might seem monotonous, becomes full of significance and charm; the very monotony of so true a tune, so sincerely and artistically prolonged, wins you more and more to its mood, and you reluctantly dismiss it, preferring that it should still entwine itself about your willing senses, with all the sweet feelings it has awakened. Even the quaintness of the phrases, the old-fashioned appoggiatura with which one is so often attacked, heightens the charm. Mrs. CARY entered truly into the spirit of the music, and sang it with chaste fervor, feeling it deeply, and with sustained artistic beauty. Her voice is of a character somewhat easily overshadowed by orchestral accompaniment, it is true, but it atones in quality for all it lacks in quantity. A more sympathetic, purely musical contralto we do not know; such a voice certifies to a fine musical nature. She had never essayed a Bach aria before in public, and the sure instinct with which she at once caught its spirit and truthfully expressed it, makes us hope that she will cultivate a field so little known, so sure to be rewarding. We dare not say that all the audience appreciated the song, but we are sure it left a deep and sweet impression in the hearts of very many, and we have hope of yet hearing the Passions-musik as a whole in Boston.

More clearly heard, and more appreciated by all was the Mozart air: "Deh vieni," one of the purest, heavenliest strains of love-fraught melody that even his genius ever was inspired withal. This suited Mrs. Cary's voice precisely, and she sang it to a charm, Mr. Dresel supplying a very full and faithful accompaniment on the piano. The Mendelssohn song was also admired.

CARL ROSA, welcomed with new interest after his marriage with a queen of song, attacked the first movement of the Beethoven Concerto with his usual chivalrous ardor, carrying it through bravely, fully understanding it and entering into its spirit. Yet it must be confessed, the conditions under which he played could not be altogether favorable to the finest exertion of his art. Perpetual travelling to and fro and miscellaneous concert-giving, coupled with other excitements, must needs disturb the calmness, the result of balanced forces, which is the condition of the true artistic life. Popular concert-giving, such an artist feels too well, is not artistic life; it is Business, jostling, enslaving and abusing Art. The occurrence of harsh sounds, the forcing of the tones of his instrument, too often betrayed the young artist's need of a period of rest and quiet study; the finer the nature, the more indispensable that. Of course there were electrifying passages, as well as traits of tender and poetic delicacy; and the piece as a whole, so quickening in itself, so grandly worked up with the orchestra, was heard with lively interest. In the Bach Chaconne, which we still feel to be the greatest (including the quality of poetic) of all violin solo pieces, and which Rosa played in its original form without any accompaniment, he was more fully himself and made a capital impression. Then you felt what the Violin is! It seems Bach felt it, knew it, before the modern virtuoso, Paganini days.

The Rondo, in E flat, by Mendelssohn was new to our public; a movement full of life and elasticity, swift as an arrow in its flight, and going as straight to the mark. It was just the thing to show the limpid, even, faultless and swift finger-ing of young PERABO, who bent over it so quietly while his hands seemed to move automatically, as if by hidden springs, with such beautiful precision and ease; at the same time there was an inexpressible grace diffused over it all. He was enthusiastically recalled; he always is.

After all these things there was no music which we felt more in the mood to hear than just that Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Wonderful hour of purest bliss and sunshine in the darkest days of the deaf master! Such joy could no one know who had not suffered as he had. This Symphony is like a fresh spring suddenly gushing out of the hard ground and sparkling in the sun. It is as clear an inspiration, and as happy, as anything of Mozart. This time it was very satisfactorily played, to the great credit of the orchestra and of Mr. ZERRAHN's persistent, careful drilling.

Chamber Concerts.

ERNST PERABO's sixth "Schubert Matinée" concluded the series in grand style, with this programme:

- Grand Trio, B flat, Op. 90.....Schubert.
Song: "Che farò".....Gluck.
Sonata, F minor, Op. 142, erroneously styled Four Impromptus.....Schubert.
Song: "Forgi amor".....Mozart.
Grand Septuor, D minor, Op. 74.....Hummel.

The Schubert Trio was interesting so soon after hearing the other one (in E flat, op. 100), though not quite so interesting, to our mind, as that. Schumann says: "They differ essentially and inwardly. The first movement, which in the Op. 100 is full of rage and again of uncontainable longing, is here graceful, confiding, maidenlike; the Adagio, there a sigh, rising to heartfelt anguish, is here a blissful dreaming, a swelling and subsiding of fine human feeling. The Scherzos resemble each other; but I give the preference to that of the second Trio. About the last movements I do not decide. In a word, the E-flat Trio is more active, manly, dramatic; this on the other hand is pathetic, feminine, lyrical." It was finely played. The Hummel Septet, which was Perabo's first introduction to Boston (in a Symphony Concert) came out more gloriously than ever. The young artist was in his best mood and seemed to surpass himself. The four Sonata movements, which a publisher chose to separate as "four Impromptus," was another delightful specimen of Schubert's inexhaustible invention, though we should hardly place it in the very first rank among his Sonatas. Miss BARROW, with a good rich contralto voice, well cultivated, made a very good impression and seems capable of something truly fine.

These Matinées, while they have exhibited the versatility, the wonderful memory and mastery of the young pianist, have been wholly unique in character, and have largely increased our knowledge and appreciation of the treasures which Schubert's genius, like a retreating wave, left carelessly in such profusion on this mortal shore. They have also introduced choice things, rarely or never heard before, from other masters, and must therefore count for much in our account of progress.

HERMANN DAUM's third and last "Beethoven Matinée," last Tuesday, we were sorry to be unable to attend. The programme was interesting. Besides the repetition of the great B flat Trio for a close, it had the Piano and Violin Sonata in F, op. 24, by Messrs. DAUM and H. SUCK, and the Piano Sonata, op. 26, in A flat. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN sang again the "Busied" and another Lied by Beethoven.

(Crowded out last time). Four very rich Chamber Concerts demand record for this fortnight, and we must despatch them much too briefly.

CARL ROSA's MATINEE, last Saturday afternoon, crowded Chickering's Hall with choicest audience, and was one of the most delightful affairs of the kind that any of us remember. Of course PERABO, ROSA and DRESEL were names to conjure by. The programme was rare and admirable:

- Rondo—for Piano and Violin, B minor.....Schubert.
Sonata and Aria—"Ah! Perfido".....Beethoven.

Sonata—for Piano and Violin, C minor.....Beethoven.
Aria, "Frohlocke mein Herz".....Bach.
With Violin Obligato by Mr. Carl Rosa.
a) Gavotte. (Violin).....Bach.
b) Abandoned.....Schumann.
Songs. {a) The First Violet.....Mendelssohn.
          {b) Frühlingslied.....Haydn.
Sonata, for Piano and Violin.....Haydn.

We have never felt the power and beauty of Pappas's singing so much as on this occasion. In "Ahl perfido," she showed real dramatic power and feeling; the voice "had a tear in it;" and with the masterly accompaniment of Mr. Dresel, in which the piano seemed sensitively to feel with the singer, the scene made a great impression. The two Mendelssohn songs were beautifully contrasted; the innocent fragrance of the Violet was there, and the sadness; and the "Spring Song" was full of ardent hope and joy. But the Aria of Bach, so running over with joy, at once religious, childlike, hearty, a spiritual frolic, one may say (taking hint from the first German word), was what she gave herself to with all her generous, genial, healthy nature; it was splendidly sung and had to be repeated. Was this your "dry old Bach?"

The Schubert Rondo, a piece full of fire, was just the thing for Rosa and was capably done by both artists. The Beethoven Sonata, however, was the perfect thing of all, and gave the deepest pleasure, especially the slow movement. Nor could there have been a more enlivening, wholesome ending than the little Haydn Sonata (originally a Trio, but the 'cello part is easily absorbed into the piano). For us it recalled Clara Schumann and Joachim, and those who heard it this time will not wonder that it was a favorite with those artists. It begins with the very phrase of the Farmer's song in the "Seasons," a momentary suggestion only, and goes on full of life and almost witty felicities. Mr. Rosa's violin solos were exquisitely played, and the whole concert went off to a charm. We trust the same destiny that has united these two artists, also means that their orbit shall centre more and more on Boston, and that we shall have other concerts of this kind.

ERNST PERABO's fifth "Schubert Matinée (Feb. 21) was the most remarkable of all. Think of a young artist playing from memory the entire Sonata, op. 106, of Beethoven! the longest continued effort of the master's most excited and profoundly brooding creative imagination; so full of contrasts, so intense and deep, so complex, so broken up by seeming interruptions of new and irrepressible ideas! Yet it was done with certainty and power to the end. Think, too, of playing in the same programme that wonderful Schubert Fantasia in Sonata form, op. 78, beginning with the broad, rich, stately Molto moderato e cantabile, in G! We thought he did not take it moderato enough for its character. And how delicious the Andante, the strong Minuetto and heavenly-sweet Trio, the finale Allegretto! This was a Schubert Sonata worth the hearing. Besides these pieces we had Beethoven's Sonata, op. 102, No. 1, with Violoncello, finely played by Mr. FRIES, a work of rare beauty, and Schubert's Variations on an original theme, in A flat, op. 35, a masterly reading by Perabo and DRESEL. Another young debutante, Miss FARWELL, sang Cherubini's Ave Maria and Schubert's "Serenade" in a style that showed right culture and with good expression.

MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA has completed his first course of "Schumann Soirées," and we are glad to see that he intends to give four more, in a period a little less crowded with other music, let us hope. We have only room to record his last two programmes, with the remark that all his piano performances of works so important, difficult, and some of them rare, were masterly in technique and style; that it was a great treat to hear Urso's violin in the "Kreutzer" Sonata; and that both Miss LORING and Miss RYAN caught the spirit of the fine German songs and sang them charmingly.

Third Soirée, Feb. 14.

Fantasia-Bilder. Op. 28.....Schumann.
Song, "The Violet".....Mozart.
Grand Sonata. Op. 47.....Beethoven.
Songs {a) Night Song.....Schumann.
          {b) Nut Tree.....Richter.
Sonata, Op. 27.....Franz.
Slumber Song.....Vieuxtemps.
Violin Concerto.....Vieuxtemps.

Fourth Soirée, Feb. 23.

Quintet in E flat, Op. 44.....Schumann.
Songs {a) Thekla's Lament.....Schubert.
          {b) Thine is my heart.....Mendelssohn.
Trio in C minor, Op. 63.....Mendelssohn.
Songs {a) Up from my Tears are springing.....Schumann.
          {b) To the Sunlight.....Chopin.
Concerto in F minor, Op. 21.....Chopin.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The Wednesday Afternoon Concerts are giving a great deal of pleasure and recruiting fresh audience for much good classical music, the proportion of which largely exceeds that of the "light and popular" in all their programmes. The second concert (March 6) opened with Cherubini's Overture to "Les Abencerrages," which pleased so in the Harvard concerts. Then followed a Violoncello solo, an Adagio, by Romberg, artistically played by Mr. AUGUST SUCK. Then Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, which sounded fresh again. Then Mr. PERABO played Mendelssohn's brilliant Capriccio in B minor, admirably of course, and for an encore fitly chose the well-known fiery Prelude in E minor. A Waltz closed the entertainment.

This week the Overture was Beethoven's Egmont; the Symphony, Mozart's graceful little "French" one in D. MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA played Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto in splendidly effective style. Miss BARTON won very hearty applause by her singing of a contralto recitative and Cavatina from Il Giuramento. A Fantasia for the Bassoon, played by Mr. PAUL ELTZ, was curious as illustrating the character and capacity of the instrument and the remarkable skill of the performer; but the charm of its individuality is lost when it steps out of the orchestra. The concert waltzed itself out as usual, gracefully and brightly, away "over land and sea," so far as a fancy title may so lead.

A plenty of other concerts there have been, and big ones, some with "model programmes"—so called perhaps because each thing in them is out of its place; as if the cramming of all sorts into one basket, even if they be good sorts singly, could be a safe model to go by in anything but making money! Model advertisements too, a yard long, with a mountebank proclamation before the name of each piece and artist, on the principle that Art may be all very well, but that things got up in the name of Art are a far better dodge, and that the art of arts in this advanced age of ours is Advertising. These things are not conceived in any spirit of Art, nor prompted by any love of Art; they are not planned by artists, but by artists' agents and runners setting up to do a clever stroke of business (in the name of Music) on their own account. Such things, although the "stars" (out of their courses) fight with them, hardly come within the scope of Art criticism or notice, save as curiosities or symptoms of the times.

MR. JOHN K. PAINE arrived a few days since, in good health and spirits, happy in the success of his Mass in Berlin, of which an account will be found in another column. He has already returned to his duties at Harvard University.

J. Mosenthal's Services for the Episcopal Church.

No. 1. Venite, in C. 2. Te Deum, in F. 3. Jubilate, in B flat. 4. Gloria, in B flat and D. 5. Bonum est, in E flat. 6. Deus Misereatur, in E. New York: published by William A. Pond & Co.

How thankless and difficult a task it is to write church music suited to the tastes of the majority of church goers, only the practical organist, who conscientiously respects his profession, can judge. He is in a measure obliged to ignore what the really cultivated artist understands by "church music," unless he chooses to resign his position. He can only timidly make use of a few of the trifles written by those great masters, who dedicated their noblest powers to the service of the church; for the singers who do the singing of the congregation—after favorite solo or concert singers—are anxious to shine with their voices, and do not care to trouble themselves about learning "heavy music," as some of them ignorantly style the songs of Bach, Handel, etc. Then the congregation must be "pleased;" and the music committee, too frequently composed of men who have not the least inkling of an idea as to what sacred music really is and should be, keep a sharp look out lest they be deprived of their favorite anthems, arrangements of operatic themes, improvements (?) of old hymns, settings of popular songs, "Oh ye tears," "When the swallows," etc., etc., ad nauseam.

Such a state of things is most unsatisfactory to the sensible musician; he thinks of all possible means to reform such a misuse of music, but the evil has taken so deep a root, that the effort can only be made with care and prudence. Among these thoughtful musicians we class Mr. Mosenthal. He possesses uncommon musical knowledge, and a desire to use his powers in the service of the best. For many years organist in one of the principal churches of New York, he has had ample experience of the particular needs of the Episcopal service here in the department of music.

We regard the above compositions, written with such an aim as we have alluded to, as—to speak a little figuratively—a bridge pointing and leading to the sacred compositions of Haydn, Mozart, Spohr, and Mendelssohn. They are written in a pure style, and always with respect to the words of the text; well calculated for the voice, without being difficult. They are intended more especially for a quartet, while presenting opportunities to all the voices to distinguish themselves in pleasant solos. The organ accompaniment is carefully written in support of the quartet; and we are sure that Mr. Mosenthal's Services will be welcomed wherever there is a taste for good church music. The outward appearance of the series is tasteful, and the printing and engraving clear and correct. F. L. RITTER.

WE learn that Messrs. OLIVER DITSON & Co., Music publishers of this city, have purchased the stock, copyrights and business of the late firm of Firth, Son & Co., of New York, and established a branch of their house there, under the charge of Mr. CHARLES H. DITSON, the junior partner.

WORCESTER, MASS. A writer in the Spy says:

Passing along Main street last evening, I was attracted by the sound of voices as of "many waters," &c., &c. Following the melodious sounds, I soon reached Brinley Hall, ascertaining at once the pleasing music I had heard to be made by the Mozart and Beethoven Choral Union. I found more than one hundred and fifty interested singers, led by the efficient and popular conductor, Carl Zerrahn—the work in hand Beethoven's "Engedi," or "David in the Wilderness." I was told the society numbers over two hundred active members; that their musical library is valued at more than nine hundred dollars, etc. I was also informed that the "Union" intend rendering "Engedi," with various selections, making up a meritorious and interesting miscellaneous concert, on the evening of our annual Fast.

This is well; but why not sing Beethoven's music to the words and subject of his own choice, "Christ at the Mount of Olives," instead of this English perversion of it into "Engedi?"

MRS. VAN ZANDT and OTHER SINGERS. This lady, whom many will recollect as having made a very favorable impression at the great Musical Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society in this city, two years ago, is meeting with very great success in opera abroad. According to a correspondent in Warsaw, Russia, Mrs. Van Zandt began a six months' engagement in that city in November last, with the Russian Government, making her debut in Lucia, and achieving an "immense success;" since which she has appeared nine times as Margherite in "Faust," with increasing popularity at each representation. Her repertoire now consists of fourteen operas. She goes to Vienna to sing during the month of May. Her movements after that date are not given.

Our correspondent also refers to the success of Mrs. Kempton in opera at Milan, and likewise to the melancholy demise of Mrs. Ford, another Boston lady, which has been previously referred to.

It is pleasant to record the success of American ladies in the Old World; and many more are destined to take a high rank in the profession, among whom may be named Miss Annie Cary as one of the most promising, if reports are to be credited. Miss Huntley has already attained to considerable eminence, and Miss Whitton is hard at work perfecting herself in the divine art.—Transcript, Feb. 9.

Boston opera-goers of the glorious days of "the first Havana troupe," at the Howard Athenæum, well remember the subject of the following obituary, (from the Philadelphia City Item) and will always associate him with Tedesco, Ranieri, Vita, Novelli, &c.

Signor Natale Perelli, whose death last week has caused universal regret, was born in Milan in 1816, and at an early age evinced so decided a talent for music that he was placed in the Conservatoire, and thoroughly grounded in the rudiments of his art. Shortly after his leaving the Conservatoire, he produced his first opera, "Osti non Osti," which possessed so much merit that it still holds the Italian stage. His career having opened so well, he then wrote "Clarissa Harlowe," (which will be remembered by all who heard it last year in Philadelphia,) "Belshazzar," and many others, which, being the property of European managers, have never been heard in America, but have achieved triumphs in the old world, the leading roles having been sung by Medori, Bellini, Angelini, and other celebrated vocalists. It will be remembered that Perelli sang in opera in Philadelphia in 1847, at the Walnut Street Theatre. His adoption of the operatic stage was a mere accident. A tenor, petted and spoiled, was to sing in "Lucia," but at the last moment, refused to do so. Rather than disappoint the audience Perelli undertook the part, and achieved such a success that he was at once engaged, and appeared in "Lucrezia Borgia," "Corrado D'Altamura," by Ricci, "Due Foscari," by Verdi, "Ernani," &c. Coming to America with the Marti troupe, he created a decided sensation, especially in Philadelphia, and was so much admired as an artist that our citizens urged him to remain. He did so, and Philadelphia has been his home until his death. He at once took a leading position as teacher of singing, and became very popular. His method was the best, and his pupils number some of our finest singers. He was an ardent lover of his profession, and may be said to have killed himself with over-work. He was never idle, and the task was too great for him. He died from debility, not from disease. His pupils at his death numbered at least fifty. He was married, but his wife died some few years ago, leaving with him two children—a boy and girl—now grown, and living near Milan, on a beautiful villa Perelli presented them. They have never visited America, but every year Perelli made a voyage to Europe. He had engaged his passage for the coming June, expecting to witness the Great Exposition. His death will be much regretted, for he was highly respected by all who knew him, and by his loss the cause of music will suffer. Still we have Signori Rondinella and Durand. We cannot recommend Rizzio, who is not digne de fois, and inferior to the gentlemen we have named. Perelli left a couple of manuscript operas: "Clara di Montalvo," and "Conti di Sperlings," which are in the hands of Messrs. Constant Guillou and Alfred Durand. We trust they will be produced by Perelli's pupils. On Monday he was buried from St. John's church, with very imposing ceremonies. Selections from Mozart's "Requiem," and "Twelfth Mass," were sung, and the Germania Orchestra assisted. Perelli's pupils should by all means get up some testimonial to his memory. Several performances of his new operas, the proceeds to go toward erecting over him a suitable monument, would be a good idea.

THE CONCERT FOR THE CRETANS. The following correspondences completes the record given in our last:

To Dr. Samuel G. Howe, Hon. John A. Andrew, &c., Executive Committee of the Greek Relief Committee:

GENTLEMEN: In behalf of the Concert Committee of the Harvard Musical Association, I have the pleasure of hereby placing in your hands for the relief of

"exiled and starving women and children of the Cretan patriots," the sum of $2249 22, the net result of the concert of the 18th inst. The gross receipts were $2460.

This response of our music-loving citizens to your appeal is certainly gratifying, while it shows how well a noble Art can plead the cause of Man. But a goodly portion of the large sum realized has to be counted as the personal contribution of the artists, who not only made the concert so attractive, but who each and all freely gave their service. It is for your Committee, rather than for us, to name them with due credit; and the accompanying programme of the concert shows you who they were. Allow us to suggest, however, that this sacrifice of time and labor, on the part of the fifty or more hard-working members of the orchestra, was especially significant.

The pecuniary result is further increased by the free offer of the Music Hall on the part of its Directors; by the generosity of Messrs. Alfred Mudge & Son in accepting nothing for the programmes; as well as by liberal deductions from the fair charges of Mr. Peck, whose zeal and judgment in the sale of the tickets and otherwise, were invaluable,—of Mr. Plumer for printing tickets, and of the Daily Advertiser and Traveller for advertising.

Trusting that this concert also indirectly aids the Cretan cause, by inspiring a more general interest in it, I remain, gentlemen, with great respect,

Your servant,

JOHN S. DWIGHT.

Boston, February 22, 1867.

GREEK RELIEF COMMITTEE,
OFFICE, 20 BROMFIELD STREET,
BOSTON, Feb. 23, 1867.

To John S. Dwight, Esq. Dear Sir—We beg to tender through you to the concert committee of the Harvard Musical Association our most earnest thanks for the very noble sum of $2249 22, which you have sent us as the net proceeds of the concert given in the Music Hall on the 18th inst. in behalf of "the exiled and starving women and children of the Cretan patriots."

So generous a response to our appeal, on the part of the public, is extremely gratifying as an indication of the general interest which the heroic struggle of these gallant islanders for their freedom against the whole force of a great empire has awakened among us, and of the sympathy with which the sufferings and miseries it has brought in its train are regarded.

It is hard to find in history a conflict that can compare with this for the heroism and self-sacrifice with which it has been conducted, or for the importance of the issue it involves—that issue being, as we all know, no less than the regeneration of the fairest part of the world, the seat of that ancient civilization to which the modern is so deeply indebted for many of its greatest treasures in literature and art; and the final emancipation of Christian nations from the domination of an alien and barbarous race.

It was an exceedingly beautiful thought of yours that art should lend its aid to a cause so holy, and the good taste and good judgment with which you have given effect to the thought do equal honor to you and to those who have co-operated with you.

The magnificent orchestra of the Symphony Concerts has a special claim upon our gratitude for its costly offering of time and labor,—an offering which, from the sacrifices it entails upon the industrious and able artists that compose the orchestra, the public will surely not fail to appreciate. The Orpheus Musical Society, Miss Houston and Mr. P. H. Powers, the distinguished pianists, Mr. Otto Dresel, Ernst Perabo, B. J. Lang, and Hugo Leonhard; and the accomplished conductors, Messrs. Carl Zerrahn and August Kreissmann, have all nobly crowned the favor in which they are held among us by this gracious consecration of their high artistic powers to the illustration of the strength and delicacy of that sentiment of brotherhood which makes the cause of freedom the common concern of every enlightened and high-minded man and woman the world over.

To these eminent artists, as well as to all the other persons you have enumerated in your letter as helping to achieve the great success of this concert, the Executive Committee beg now to tender their warmest thanks on behalf of those they have the honor to represent.

And assuring you that the money thus generously contributed shall find its way in the quickest and most efficacious manner to the unfortunate persons it is meant to succor, we remain, with very great regard, my dear sir, Faithfully yours,

SAMUEL G. HOWE, JOHN A. ANDREW,
AMOS A. LAWRENCE, HERMANN J. WARNER,
HORATIO WOODMAN,

Executive Committee.

Sung by Mrs. Howard Paul, and is quite singable and melodious.
Sing me that song again. Song. J. W. Mordock. 30

Two good songs. In the last "O Elinor," rings out very melodiously in the chorus.
The good-bye at the door. Duet. S. Glover. 40
An excellent piece, musically and morally.
Still he kept thinking. Ballad. J. P. Ordway. 30
Pretty "soldier boy" ballad.
Outside her window. Song. Wadsworth. 40

Instrumental.

- Meditation. Caprice Etude. W. J. M'Dougall. 75
Of much merit. Difficult, but has a rich melody, and worthy of careful study by amateurs.
Beautiful Lena. Transcription. V. B. Aubert. 40
The original melody, by Flobert, is a charming one, and the transcription is graceful, and not difficult.
Blue Bird Polka. V. B. Aubert. 35
Quite elegant, and when skillfully played, fills the air with sweet warblings. Easy medium difficulty.
Lena, March sentimentale. S. G. Pratt. 35
Contains the melody of "Beautiful Lena."
Flowers of Memory Schottisch. A. Berge. 30
Delicate and sweet. Easy medium difficulty.
Fresh Hopes. "Land of Dreams." C. Grobe. 40
The Vesper Bell. " " 40
Both are excellent instructive pieces, and the last is especially pleasing and delicate.
The Naiads Barcarole. E. Mack. 40
Very neat and piquant, and not difficult.
La Zingara, or the "Bohemian Girl." B. Richards. 40
One begins to play this with the inward inquiry, "what can Richards make of these well-worn melodies?" but so charmingly and in such novel forms are they arranged, that on laying it down, one believes to have played something entirely new.
The Sociable Lancers. C. Weingarten. 50
Sociable fellows, these Lancers, no doubt, but that is not the meaning. Mr. "Wine-garden" has done a good thing for sociable parties, in which, we suppose, the military rather predominates over the military department.
La Gaditane Polka. C. Bizet. 30
One of the prettiest of polkas, and has the merit of being quite different in form from others.
Dow Drop Waltzes. D'Albert. 4 hands.
F. S. Davenport. 1.00
Sprightly, and useful for learners.

Books.

- HELLER'S ART OF PHRASING, with foreign fingering. Book 1. $1.75
Many learners have little natural taste in playing. Such studies as the above have sometimes a remarkable effect in awakening and strengthening such a faculty; and learners in general will not regret a few weeks or months spent in their study.
